

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

NEW SERIES.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

FRANK MILLER, Resp't.,

v.

FRANK J. HOESCHLER, Appt.

(121 Wis. 558, 99 N. W. 228.)

Injunction—trespass—fence.

Equity will take jurisdiction of a suit to restrain repeated acts of trespass upon plaintiff's dooryard for the purpose of erecting and maintaining a fence there, under its power to prevent a multiplicity of inadequate actions at law for the trespass.

(April 19, 1904.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court for La Crosse County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in a suit to enjoin trespass upon plaintiff's dooryard. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Subject Note.—Injunction to compel or prevent the erection, maintenance, or removal of fences or gates.

I. Scope.

This note treats of the appropriateness of the remedy by injunction in suits where the right to erect, maintain, or remove fences or gates is in question. It includes all such cases, whether relief in other particulars was asked or not. Since the fact that other elements of injury were considered obviously weakens the force of the decision as an authority in fence cases, these additional elements have, in each instance, been indicated when important, so that the propositions may not be misleading.

II. Injunctive relief on ground of trespass.

a. Introductory.

The remedy which courts of law afford for trespasses being retributive, it is indispensable to the protection of persons in the use, integrity, and value of their property, that there should exist somewhere a preventive power. Unless there is some jurisdiction to prevent irreparable mischief by trespassers, there would be, as Lord Eldon puts it, "a great failure of justice in the country." This power is wisely lodged with the courts of chancery, to be exercised with enlightened discretion, by process of injunction.

Anciently courts of equity would not intervene by injunction in cases of trespass, but left the party to his legal remedy. But equitable jurisdiction to enjoin the commission of trespasses on real estate, though of comparatively recent origin, is now firmly established. It is an outgrowth of the interference by courts of equity to prevent 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Mr. John A. Daniels, for respondent:

The special features necessary to equity jurisdiction may be found where there is great vexation to be feared from repeated or continued trespasses.

Willard, Eq. Jur. p. 383.

Now that the circuit court exercises legal and equitable jurisdiction in the same action, and may grant any relief which could formerly be obtained either at law or in equity, there is no necessity whatever for instituting a second action, when to do so would only tend to a multiplicity of suits, which the law abhors.

Stein v. Benedict, 83 Wis. 603, 53 N. W. 891.

The plaintiff may maintain his action in equity to enjoin the defendant from obstructing his door yard and his free pas-waste. Their jurisdiction in that particular was founded upon the necessity of preventing irremediable injury, and was exercised only in cases where a privity of title existed between the parties. The remedy by injunction proved so efficient in thwarting the commission of waste that it was soon invoked to prevent injuries to real property by persons having no privity of title; the tort being denominated a trespass. This jurisdiction has been exercised in England since the time of Lord Thurlow, the first case of injunction for trespass apparently being that of Flamang, cited and followed in Mitchell v. Dors, 6 Ves. Jr. 147, by Lord Chancellor Eldon, who subsequently, in Hanson v. Gardiner, 7 Ves. Jr. 306, referred to it in these words: "I remember when, in a case of trespass, unless it grew to a nuisance, an injunction would have been refused; and even in the case of waste, if, by temporary acts, from time to time merely, the subject of an action, and not bringing along with it irreparable mischief, Lord Hardwicke thought it was granted only as following the relief. Lord Thurlow had great difficulty as to trespass. I have a note of a remarkable case in which the name of one of the parties was Flamang. There was a demise of close A to a tenant for life, the lessor being landlord of an adjoining close, B. The tenant dug a mine in the former close. That was waste from the privity. But when we asked an injunction against this digging in the other close, though a continuation of the working in the former close, Lord Thurlow hesitated much, but did at last grant the injunction,—first, from the irreparable ruin of the property as a mine; secondly, as it was a species of trade; and thirdly, upon the principle of this court enjoining on matter of trespass, where irreparable damage is the consequence." The jurisdiction thus initiated has been widely exercised.

In the leading case of Jerome v. Ross, 7 Johns. Ch. 315, 11 Am. Dec. 484, where it was sought to enjoin a trespass by the removal of stone from a ledge of rock, Chan-sage from his house to the street, and the right will be determined in that action, and, if the plaintiff shows himself entitled to it, a permanent injunction will be granted.

In order to exclude the exercise of the equitable functions of the court, it is not enough that there is a remedy at law, but it must be plain and adequate, or, in other words, as practicable and efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity.

Wilson v. Mineral Point, 39 Wis. 160; Ryan v. Schwartz, 94 Wis. 403, 69 N. W. 178; Cullickson v. Madsen, 87 Wis. 19, 57 N. W. 965; Miller v. Drane, 100 Wis. 1, 75

Equity will interfere where the injury is irreparable, or where full and adequate relief cannot be granted at law, or where the trespass goes to the destruction of the property as it had been held and enjoyed, or where it is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

Shipley v. Ritter, 7 Md. 408, 61 Am. Dec. 372; Storer v. Great Western R. Co. 3 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 106; North Union R. Co. v. Bolton & P. R. Co. 3 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 345; *Rigby v. cellor Kent, after fully reviewing the course of decisions in England and in the state of New York, announced the rule that, while an injunction would not be granted to restrain a trespasser because he is a trespasser, yet an injunction would issue where the injury is irreparable; when full and adequate relief cannot be granted at law; when the trespass goes to the destruction of the property as it has been held and enjoyed; or when it is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits in cases where the right is controverted by numerous persons, each standing on his own pretensions. In the course of the opinion he says: "A troublesome man may vex and harass his neighbor by throwing down his fences and turning cattle upon its grounds, or by passing over them, or otherwise annoying him; but it is to be presumed that repeated recoveries for damages, with the punishment of costs, and such smart money as a jury would naturally give, would soon effectually correct any such disposition. At any rate, I do not know that a court of equity has ever interfered merely to correct such a practice; and it would certainly require very strong evidence of the inefficacy of the ordinary legal remedies for compensation, as well as for correction, before this court would venture to assume a jurisdiction hitherto unknown."

The tendency of Chancellor Kent to limit relief by injunction to a comparatively few aggravated cases of trespass is opposed to the weight of modern decisions. In the progress of society, courts of equity have gradually yielded to the pressure of public necessity, and have accorded a much more liberal and energetic protection or relief by injunction in cases of destructive damage to property than was formerly given in cases of an analogous character. It is still affirmed that the injury must be great or irreparable,—one which cannot be adequately compensated in damages. But the right to invoke the jurisdiction of a court of equity depends upon the facts in each case, and the main inquiry is whether the legal remedy under the particular circumstances of the case is adequate. Injuries have been held to be irreparable, and the legal remedy inadequate, under many circumstances where Chancellor Kent would probably have refused to interfere. This has practically enlarged the equitable jurisdiction without extending the principle itself. Moreover, dissent has not been wanting from the doctrine that it is better to permit a threatened wrong to be done, and then attempt to compensate for it by pecuniary damages, than to prevent its commission by the issuance of an injunction.

b. Restraining trespass generally.

1. Adequacy of remedy at law.

See also II., c, 1, infra.

The inadequacy of the legal remedy is the foundation or indispensable prerequisite for the interposition of a court of equity. But where, under the circumstances, the remedy at law is not practicable or efficient, equity will intervene.

Lessors who may become liable for consequential damages because of their lessee's failure to enjoy the leased premises due to the inclosure of the property with fences by a third person, which damages may exceed any sum recoverable by them in an action brought at law against the wrongdoer, are entitled to an injunction requiring the removal of the fence, on the ground that they have not at law a remedy so plain, adequate, and complete as in equity. Barbee v. Shannon, 1 Ind. Terr. 199, 40 S. W. 584.

So, one in peaceable possession of premises which he has purchased and devoted to the purpose of feeding live stock bought for shipment, is entitled to an injunction restraining one who enters upon the property and commences to inclose a portion of it with a fence and turns thereon a number of hogs, since the remedy at law is inadequate for the reason that the measure of damages recoverable would be the reasonable value of the use of the property during the time

353; Boston Water Power Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 16 Pick, 525; Jarden v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 3 Whart. 513.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in equity to enjoin the commission of repeated and continuous threatened trespasses upon real estate. A general demurrer to the complaint having been overruled, the defendant appeals. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff owns, occupies, and has record title to, certain lots in the city of La Crosse, and has occupied the same for many years as a homestead; also that plaintiff occupies, and, by adverse possession for more than twenty years, has title to, a certain described strip of land between said lots and Ninth street, in said city, which constitutes a part of his said homestead and dooryard, and constitutes his only means of access to said Ninth street; that defendant wrongfully entered on said strip in May, 1903, and constructed a wire fence on the side thereof nearest to plaintiff's house, thereby cutting off the plaintiff from the use of his dooryard and from all access to Ninth street from his said house; that plaintiff immediately removed said fence, but that defendant asserts and threatens that he will re-enter and reconstruct the fence as often as plaintiff removes same, and plaintiff fears that he will do so, and thus cause plaintiff an irreparable injury, and force the commencement of a multiplicity of trespass actions, unless the defendant be restrained from such acts.

The simple question presented is whether the owner was kept out of possession, irrespective of the collateral or consequential injuries that might result to his business or stock. Carter v. Warner, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 688, 89 N. W. 747.

While a court of equity will not, as a general rule, interpose in the case of a mere naked trespass, yet, where the act done, or threatened to be done, would be destructive of the substance of the estate, or the injury is or would be irreparable, equity will afford relief.

Equity will not intervene to restrain one who has repeatedly opened the inclosure surrounding the premises of another, cut and removed hay and grain therefrom, turned cattle therein, and, claiming the right to do so, threatens to continue such acts to the destruction of crops and shrubbery, since no irreparable injury or destruction of the substance of the estate is shown. Moore v. Halliday, 43 Or. 243, 99 Am. St. Rep. 724, 72 Pac. 801. The court remarked: The opening of the inclosure may have been accomplished by a mere removal of bars or unfastening of a gate that would not amount to a permanent injury to the fence, conceding that to be a part of the realty.

One faction of a religious society should not be enjoined from breaking open locked gates of the society's burying ground for the purpose of making burials therein, where the plaintiffs ask only that the defendants shall request permission of them and pay the usual charges by way of recognizing their right to control the cemetery, since the burials would be at most mere trespasses, doing not only no irreparable, but no serious, injury. Miller v. English, 6 N. J. Eq. 304.

Such irreparable injury as will authorize an injunction to restrain county commissioners from removing the fence around the original exemption from the general stock law, and building another fence around the lines of the additional exemption, including the plaintiff's plantation, is not shown, where it is not alleged that the old fence is to be removed from, or the new fence placed upon, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

any portion of the plaintiff's plantation, but he complains that it will be necessary for him at great expense to fence in his crops to protect them from stock running at large, the property of insolvent neighbors, and that, if he fails to do so, his tenants will desert his premises. Hamer v. Brown, 40 S. C. 336, 18 S. E. 938. The court observed: The only injuries complained of in this action are not such as will warrant the court in granting the injunction prayed for, and, though in a more aggravated form, they are only such as every planter endured from the Colonial days until the passage of the general stock law a few years ago.

But, an injury by unlawfully cutting down fences, shade trees, and ornamental shrubbery is irreparable, and ought to be suppressed by the preventive powers of a court of equity. Tainter v. Morristown, 19 N. J. Eq. 46.

A bill alleging that defendants forcibly entered the premises of the complainant, tore down his fences, destroyed his crops, dug up his soil, are erecting an abutment thereon to support a bridge or aqueduct, and are carrying away quantities of valuable clay, presents a case of irreparable damage entitling the complainant to injunctive relief, unless it appears that it was actually done by authority of law, such as in the exercise of a statutory right to appropriate property for the construction of an aqueduct to supply a city with water. Reddall v. Bryan, 14 Md. 444, 74 Am. Dec. 550.

So, the possibility of irreparable injury will be taken into consideration in determining the propriety of dissolving an injunction, as well as of originally granting it. That important damage not remediable at law might ensue on the dissolution of an injunction restraining defendants from trespassing on land, cutting down valuable shade trees, and moving fences, is a ground for holding the injunction until full investigation on evidence in regular course, where the affidavits are in sharp conflict. McKenzie v. McCrory (Miss.) 40 So. 483.

An injunction restraining defendants in a

the complaint states a cause of action in equity, or, in other words, whether it appear therefrom that there is an adequate remedy at law. The principle that a court of equity will not interfere to prevent a mere threatened trespass upon real estate is very ancient and well understood. The idea is that such a wrong is merely temporary in its nature, and, under all ordinary circumstances, may be fully recompensed by an award of damages; hence that the legal action affords perfect and adequate relief. While this rule is still enforced, the tendency of recent decisions is to enlarge, rather than to narrow, the class of cases in which a court of equity will interfere to prevent threatened trespass. Not only will it act where the threatened trespass will work irreparable injury to the property itself, amounting essentially to destruction thereof, but also where, by reason of the continuous or repeated character of the threatened invasion, many actions at law would be necessary to be brought, in no one of which could compensation for the whole wrong be obtained. In such cases the legal remedy is held to be inadequate. It is simply an application of the very old principle that equity will interfere to prevent a multiplicity of actions at law. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 2d ed. § 1357. This principle has been frequently applied by this court in the case of the unlawful attempt by public officers to take private property for a highway or other public use. Flanders v. Wood, 24 Wis. 572; Church v. Joint School Dist. No. 12, 55 Wis. 399, 13 N. W. 272; Smart v. Hart, 75 Wis. 471, 44 N. W. 514; Ruhland v.

suit to determine title to church property of which plaintiffs are admitted to be in possession from further interference with the premises will be continued where they have torn down the fences and mutilated the church, and are preparing to erect another building upon the lot in such a manner as to injure, if not destroy, the present one. The injury thus done and threatened will be serious and irreparable. Kasian v. Stefansky, 6 Kulp, 445.

A temporary injunction restraining the authorities of a borough from removing a strip of double barbed-wire fence maintained by the plaintiffs along the boundary line of a street in a populous part of the borough will be dissolved where the fence is a nuisance per se, summarily removable by the municipal officer under the general borough law, and the plaintiffs do not allege that the proposed action of the borough authorities is likely to cause them irreparable injury. Bower v. Watsonstown, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 110.

It has been held, upon the ground of the inadequacy of the remedy at law, that an injunction will lie in the case of a trespass where the trespasser is pecuniarily irresponsible. While mere insolvency is not generally decisive of the right to grant an injunction, it constitutes in particular cases an important element in determining whether the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, should award it, for, the trespasser being insolvent, the legal remedy, "though theoretically perfect, would be practically fruitless."

Equity will restrain by injunction an insolvent person who has repeatedly thrown down the plaintiff's fencing, and on one occasion converted a portion of it to his own use, and threatens to continue the commission of like trespasses. Musselman v. Marquis, 1 Bush, 463, 89 Am. Dec. 637.

This decision rests upon the principle that equity will interpose to enjoin the commission of repeated and successive trespasses by an irresponsible party from whom no adequate compensation could be obtained in an action at law.

So, an injunction should issue to restrain trespassers who have repeatedly, without right, entered upon the plaintiff's property and interfered with the peaceable enjoyment of it, and have unlawfully torn down and cut away a screen or fence erected by him for his comfort and convenience, and threatened to do so in the future should he erect other similar structures, where the trespassers are insolvent and a judgment against them would be valueless. Chambers v. Haskell, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1707, 78 S. W. 478.

Similarly, it has been held that a petition duly verified, showing that a trespass has been committed by tearing down the fence and exposing the growing crops of the plaintiff to injury from cattle, and that a repetition of such acts is threatened, insolvency of the defendant being alleged, and the allegations as to trespass being supported by evidence, entitles the plaintiff to an injunction in the absence of any counter showing. Akin v. Jaudon, 124 Ga. 404, 52 S. E. 768.

The injury sustained must, however, be one that, in legal contemplation, is irreparable. Thus, the insolvency of a trespasser, who has repeatedly opened the inclosure surrounding the premises of another, cut and removed hay and grain therefrom, turned cattle therein, and, claiming the right to do so, threatens to continue such acts, will not alone give chancery jurisdiction to enjoin his acts, in the absence of irreparable injury to the estate, which is not shown by the acts complained of. Moore v. Halliday, 43 Or. 243, 72 Pac. 801. The reason for the apparent conflict between this and the preceding case evidently lies in the restricted scope here given to the term "irreparable injury."

But the fact of insolvency should be alleged and proved.

An averment that the employees of a railroad company are about to enter upon and inclose with a fence a strip of plaintiff's land containing about 13 acres, and situated near its right of way, does not justify an injunction restraining them from so doing, where nothing but the threatened commission of the mere trespass is shown, for which

Jones, 55 Wis. 673, 13 N. W. 689. But it has not been confined to cases of threatened public use of lands. It has also been applied to actions between private parties,—as, for instance, the threatened unlawful and continuous entry upon lands for the purpose of mining (Tippling v. Robbins, 71 Wis. 507, 37 N. W. 427); of the threatened drawing of water from a mill race (Fox River Flour & Paper Co. v. Kelley, 70 Wis. 305, 35 N. W. 744). In both of these cases the jurisdiction of equity was sustained upon the distinct ground of the prevention of the multiplicity of inadequate actions at law for trespass.

Had the defendant desired to try the question of the title to the land in question before a jury in an action at law, he could have commenced his action of ejectment and obtained his desire. He can hardly complain of the act of the plaintiff in bringing him into a court of equity, when he attempted to take the law into his own hands.

there is an adequate remedy at law, in the absence of an allegation of the insolvency of the defendant. Wabash R. Co. v. Engleman, 160 Ind. 329, 66 N. E. 892.

That defendants unlawfully claimed the right to tear down fences and enter the plaintiff's land for the purpose of cutting and removing wheat, does not justify the granting of an injunction, where the insolvency of the defendants is not alleged; since a mere threatened trespass, continuing only long enough to cut and carry away the wheat, is shown, for which compensation may be made in damages. Miller v. Burket, 132 Ind. 469, 32 N. E. 309.

Injunctive relief will not be granted to restrain the removal or destruction of fences, or of any building complainant may erect, or to prevent interference with his possession, where the insolvency of the defendants is the specific fact and only fact averred that would give a court of equity jurisdiction, while the evidence shows that the principal defendant is a man of large means. Harms v. Jacobs, 158 Ill. 505, 41 N. E. 1071.

There are, however, cases holding that relief may be afforded against a threatened continued trespass although the offender is not insolvent.

A court of equity, to prevent a threatened continued trespass, will take cognizance of a suit instituted to enjoin persons from trespassing upon church property, and from destroying the fence around the building, although the defendants may not be insolvent, where they threaten to tear down and destroy the fence as often as it is restored. Pohlman v. Evangelical Lutheran Trinity Church, 60 Neb. 364, 83 N. W. 201.

The destruction of a fence by a trespasser who threatens to destroy it as often as the fence is replaced, and to continue cutting and removing hay from a lot, entitles the owner to injunctive relief against the trespasser, although the latter may not be insolvent. Lynch v. Egan, 67 Neb. 541, 93 N. W. 775.

But ordinarily a person pecuniarily responsible will not be enjoined from committing trespass by interfering with a fence constituting personal property, or asserting a title thereto.

A solvent person should not be enjoined from interfering with a fence which is an unauthorized erection upon government land, where it does not appear that he has done / L.R.A. (N.S.)

anything more than merely to assert his ownership of the fence. If any rights have been invaded there is a plain, adequate, and speedy remedy at law. Ganow v. Denny, 68 Neb. 706, 94 N. W. 959.

The nonresidence of the trespasser is, for reasons similar to those controlling in case of insolvency, entitled to much weight in determining the propriety of exercising equitable jurisdiction. Thus, an injunction will issue to restrain nonresident trespassers who enter upon lands in the quiet and undisturbed possession of another, with force and arms, and throw down his fences, destroy his stacks of hay, and turn their stock into his meadows, under the erroneous claim that the lands do not lie within the state from which the complainants derive their title, but wholly within another state. The court said: It would be unjust that a court of equity should turn from its doors a citizen of the state, who has been subjected to aggravated and repeated trespasses, and leave him to seek redress through the precarious remedy of a suit at law in a foreign jurisdiction. Miller v. Wills, 95 Va. 337, 28 S. E. 337.

Generally speaking, injunctive relief to restrain a trespass will be denied where a remedy applicable to the particular case has been provided by statute. Thus, an injunction to restrain the supervisor of roads from trespassing upon the lands of the plaintiff for the removal of rock and stone to repair the highway was refused, although it was alleged that such official had pulled down fences and quarried rock and stone, and that the quarry was within an inclosure in which the plaintiff had a garden, orchard, meadow, and growing grain, which were turned out to the commons by opening the fences, where the statute authorizes the supervisors to enter on adjoining land to procure materials to repair roads, and the plaintiff's land is the nearest and most convenient place where suitable materials can be obtained,—especially where the statute gives a remedy to one aggrieved by the act of any supervisor by written complaint to the county court. Kendall v. Post, 8 Or. 141.

But the fact that the criminal law provides adequate punishment for trespassers who have repeatedly, without right, entered upon the plaintiff's property, and have unlawfully torn down and cut away a screen or fence erected by him for his comfort and convenience, and threaten to do so in the future should he erect other similar structures, is not a ground for denying injunctive relief; since it would afford plaintiffs no compensation for past or future trespasses upon their property. Chambers v. Haskell, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1707, 78 S. W. 478.

2. Multiplicity of suits.

A landowner may maintain an action to prevent trespass on his pasture land and the inclosure of the property with wire fences by third persons, who threaten to turn their own cattle in to graze to the exclusion of the owner and his lessees. Barbee v. Shannon, 1 Ind. Terr. 109, 40 S. W. 584.

The principle upon which equitable relief is granted in such cases is the avoidance of a multiplicity of suits, not necessarily and solely arising from the existence of a number of parties in whose favor or against whom a cause of action may exist, but arising from the necessity of bringing many and successive suits at law to obtain full redress for a continuous wrong. Jurisdiction of equity arises by reason of the necessity of repeated actions at law to redress the grievance complained of, and must, from the nature of the case, continue as long as that necessity exists.

So, one whose gates are repeatedly opened and his fences frequently broken down by a field tenant or cropper to drive cattle upon the land to graze and pasture before the removal of the crops is entitled to injunctive relief to prevent a multiplicity of suits. Tantlinger v. Sullivan, 80 Iowa, 218, 45 N. W. 765.

And a city which wrongfully enters upon premises occupied for business purposes, and removes and destroys the fence gate, and inclosure erected thereon, and drives teams and wagons carrying filth and dirt over a portion of the premises, will be enjoined at the suit of the owner. Equity will interfere to restrain repeated and continued trespasses when the wrongful acts may become the foundation of adverse rights, and occasion a multiplicity of suits to recover damages. Johnson v. Rochester, 13 Hun, 285.

3. Protection of equities.

One not entitled to a conveyance of the legal title to lots occupied by him, but held in trust by the municipal authorities, may enjoin them from tearing down the fence erected by him about the premises and designed to facilitate building operations, and from interfering with his rights, until such time as the legislature may make provision for the complete execution of the trust. The trust relation existing between the parties is sufficient ground to justify and require a court of equity to take cognizance of the case. Bingham v. Walla Walla, 3 Wash. Terr. 68, 13 Pac. 408. The court remarked: Equity can and ought to control the action of the trustee during the pendency of the trust, against acts prejudicial to the rights of the cestui que trust,—especially where those acts are backed by the high hand of official power against which he is helpless.

An injunction will lie to restrain a railroad company from removing fences or buildings, or breaking ground, or making excavations upon premises, for the purpose of constructing its railroad, prior to the payment or tender of payment of damages as required by its charter, unless the owners have misled the company by concealing their title. Ross v. Elizabeth-Town & S. R. Co. 2 N. J. Eq. 422. The court said: If the complainants, several of whom acted for their mother in obtaining damages for her from the company, stood by and saw the company go on blindfold under a conviction that their mother had the estate in fee, they have forfeited all claim to the equitable interference of the court by thus acting and concealing their title. It would be an act of fraud and injustice, estopping them from exercising their legal rights.

c. Boundary fences.

1. Adequate remedy at law.

An injunction should not be granted to prevent the removal of a few panels of a boundary fence, since the remedy at law by way of damages for the injuries is adequate. Jordan v. Lanier, 73 N. C. 90.

And an injunction should not issue to restrain a solvent landowner from throwing down panels of a boundary fence as an act of ownership, where the damages sustained thereby would be trivial. Callaway v. Webster, 98 Va. 790, 37 S. E. 276.

The threatened removal of a boundary fence will not be restrained by preliminary injunction where the trespass would be temporary only, and could be compensated in damages. Minnig's Appeal, 82 Pa. 373.

The removal of a boundary fence is an injury of a temporary and evanescent character, not justifying an application to a court of equity, but remediable by an action at law. Whitman v. Shoemaker, 2 Pearson (Pa.) 320.

That a boundary fence has been torn down does not authorize injunctive relief, where the trespass consisted of but a single act susceptible of compensation in damages. Shell v. Kemmerer, 13 Phila. 502.

But the purchaser of an interest in premises at an auditor's sale, who was thereafter awarded by decree in partition a portion of the property, consisting of open fields and woods, is entitled to an injunction against one in possession under a lease, but with notice of his superior title, who has resisted with force his attempt to build a fence on the partition line and driven him and his workmen from the ground. King v. Wilson, 54 N. J. Eq. 247, 34 Atl. 394. The court observes: An injunction here is the more efficient remedy, since the weight of the evidence is that the damage which will result from defendant's interference will be serious and not easily computed, and the defendant is of doubtful pecuniary responsibility.

One whose lands, held adversely for the statutory period, were entered by trespassers, who broke down a retaining wall and fence and set part of the line fence forward, is entitled to an injunction requiring a restoration of the fence and wall, and restraining further interference with the division line until a right to alter it shall have been established at law, although the plaintiff might have recovered damages from the trespassers and possession of the land occupied by them, and might pursue the like remedies upon a further invasion of her rights, where, in the discretion of the court, it appears that the common-law remedy, in view of all the circumstances, would fail to afford complete justice. Bussier v. Weekey, 11 Pa. Super. Ct. 463.

So, one who purchases property described in his deed as bounded by the lands of another and as separated therefrom by a wire fence, will be enjoined, at the suit of the adjoining owner, from cutting down the fence, where he has twice done so and threatens to remove every fence constructed there, and claims a right of way which he has not attempted legally to establish when it is evident he intends to carry on a system of petty annoyances which would result in loss to the adjoining owner and profit to him. Fonda, J. & G. R. Co. v. Olmstead, 84 App. Div. 127, 81 N. Y. Supp. 1041. The court says: "I think the action is maintainable in this form." The ground of the decision evidently is that the damages recoverable in successive suits would fail to compensate the injured party.

A court of equity has jurisdiction to preserve the status quo by injunction until final hearing, in case of repeated and further threatened trespasses. Thus, one who erects a post and wire fence upon what he claims to be the line between his land and that of the adjoining owner is entitled to an injunction restraining the latter from removing the posts and cutting the wires until final hearing, or until the rights of the possession are determined by an action at law, where he alleges repeated and further threatened trespasses in that regard. Roddy v. Dickson, 25 Pa. Co. Ct. 91.

And an injunction may be granted to restrain one of two adjoining landowners from removing or tearing down the line fence which was owned by them in common, where he is insolvent and the objection that there is an adequate remedy at law is waived. The ground on which equity refuses to take cognizance of and proceed in such cases, namely, that the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law, is in no sense jurisdictional. The court has power to hear and determine the action, and in general will do so, unless objection in proper form is taken. Hoff v. Olson, 101 Wis. 118, 70 Am. St. Rep. 903, 76 N. W. 1121.

of the parties to an action in equity to compel defendants to restore a division fence to its original position, and to quiet plaintiff's title to the land up to where the fence was originally located, although the action might properly have been brought as an ejectment suit cognizable at law, where defendants make no objection on that ground. Cornish v. Follis, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 300, 45 S. W. 1050.

To warrant injunctive relief there must be a showing of irreparable injury, which cannot be compensated in damages, or would be ruinous to the estate itself.

An injunction will not issue to restrain a landowner from erecting a fence upon what he claims to be the true boundary line between his property and that of an adjoining owner, where there is no showing of irreparable injury, or of more than the threatened commission of a common trespass remediable by suit at law. Harvey v. Miller, 24 App. D. C. 51.

So, the owner of land not in cultivation or inclosed is not entitled to an injunction upon mere proof that defendants, in the assertion of an adverse claim, are about to enter and build a boundary fence thereon; since no irreparable injury, irremediable at law, is shown. Lutcher v. Norsworthy (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 630.

An encroachment upon an adjoining lot, and the erection of a wooden fence thereon, do not amount to a destruction of the inheritance, or constitute irreparable injury for which the courts of law are incompetent to compensate in damages, but are mere ordinary trespasses for which a jury is the peculiar and appropriate tribunal to give redress. Herr v. Bierbower, 3 Md. Ch. 456.

But a railroad company will be enjoined from planting and continuing willow trees along its right of way and near the division line, although it is intended to attach broads to the trees when of sufficient size, and maintain them as a fence, where the roots of the trees extend into the land of an adjoining owner, exhausting the soil, and the shade from them will render a strip of his land valueless for cultivation; since the act would be ruinous or irreparable, and would impair the just enjoyment of the property in the future. Brock v. Connecticut & P. Rivers R. Co. 35 Vt. 373. The court remarks: Whether one of two adjoining landowners, holding their titles in fee, and for the ordinary purposes of cultivation, would have the right to construct a fence in this manner on the line between them, to the manifest injury of the other, is a question we are not now called upon to decide. But we think, in order to justify the railroad company in resorting to this method of fencing its road, in view of its effect upon the adjoining proprietors, there must be some strong and controlling necessity for its doing so. We are unable to find from the evidence the existence of any such necessity.

So, one who shows that the defendants have removed part of her boundary fence and thus taken part of her land, and threaten to commit a similar trespass and remove and rebuild in a similar way the rest of the fence, is entitled to injunctive relief; since the threatened trespass contemplates a permanent occupation and use of her property. Such an injury is not reparable by an action for damages. Bussier v. Weekey, 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 68.

2. Right not established at law.

Where a party's right has not been established at law, or is not clear, but is questioned on every ground on which he puts it, he is not entitled to remedy by injunction.

A preliminary injunction restraining a landlord from tearing down a boundary fence should not be awarded where the plaintiff not only fails to establish his right in the fence or in the ground on which it stands, but the evidence shows the right to both to be in the defendant. Minnig's Appeal, 82 Pa. 373.

And one claiming title by adverse possession should not be awarded an injunction against the adjoining owner, who has reset the fence so as to include a disputed strip, to compel the resetting of the fence and to restrain further trespasses until her title is determined by an action at law. Where rights which are legal are asserted on one side and denied on the other the remedies are at law. They cannot be settled under equity forms. Bussier v. Weekey, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 187.

But on appeal to the superior court, however, it was determined that one who has acquired title to property by adverse possession is entitled to enjoin a trespasser from disturbing her boundary fence and from setting it over upon her land, where the facts are not disputed but admitted by demurrer, and they establish her clear legal right in the land in controversy. In such case the plaintiff need not go into a court of law to establish the facts out of which her title grows before invoking the protection of a court of equity against the threatened invasion of her premises. A court of equity has jurisdiction, to the extent, at least, of protecting her against further encroachment on the property in her actual and peaceable possession. Bussier v. Weekey, 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 69.

3. Settlement of disputed boundary.

A bill in equity will not lie for the sole purpose of settling a disputed boundary. The existence of such a controversy is not a sufficient ground for equitable intervention, except in case of confusion of boundary occasioned by fraud, neglect, or misconduct, or when an action in equity is necessary to prevent irreparable mischief, or to suppress a multiplicity of suits and oppressive litigation, or where there are repeated trespasses by an irresponsible party and there is no adequate remedy at law.

The existence of a dispute as to the boundary between independent proprietors of adjoining lands, one of whom has built a fence on the part of the line as he claims it, does not confer jurisdiction upon a court of equity to afford injunctive relief; since neither irreparable mischief, a multiplicity of suits, nor oppressive litigation, is threatened, and the law court affords an adequate remedy by an action of trespass. Watkins v. Childs (Vt.) 65 Atl. 81.

An injunction to restrain the defendants from trespassing upon lands, breaking down fences, plowing, building fences, and digging post holes will not be granted where the defendants claim under some color of right and the plaintiff's title is disputed; but the parties should be required to refer their claims to the proper tribunal for decision of the rights claimed by each. Munyon v. Filmore, 4 Ind. Terr. 619, 76 S. W. 257.

If it appears at the hearing of the cause, upon the pleadings and proof offered, that the real object of the suit brought to restrain a solvent landowner from throwing down panels of a boundary fence as an act of ownership is to settle in a court of chancery a controverted boundary of lands, the bill should be dismissed for want of jurisdiction. A controversy affecting the title and boundaries of land cannot be settled in equity, though the property, in an urgent case, may be protected by injunction until the question of right can be determined by a trial at law. Callaway v. Webster, 98 Va. 790, 37 S. E. 276.

But an injunction will lie to restrain the erection of a new fence upon a disputed line so as to include a strip of land in controversy, where the defendant does not deny the peaceable possession of the strip beyond such fence by the plaintiff for more than twenty-five years, although he denies plaintiff's title to such strip. Coal Co. v. Savage, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 557. The court said: The case is undoubtedly near the edge of equity jurisdiction. When rights which are legal are asserted on one side and denied on the other, the remedies are at law; they cannot be settled under equity forms; this is undoubtedly the general rule. But, while the defendant, in a general way, denies the right of the plaintiff, he does not deny his long and continuous peaceable possession. The trespass which he threatens is not a sporadic one, but looks to the permanent occupation of the land. There is no reason why he should yield it to the threatened force of the defendant, and it seems to me that his hand should be stayed until he has established his alleged right at law.

A landowner is not entitled to an injunction to restrain an adjoining owner from taking down the fence and exercising ownership, under a claim of right, over a tract or land lying beyond them, since only a dispute between independent proprietors of adjoining lands as to the boundary is shown, which may be settled by a single suit at law. Walker v. Leslie, 90 Ky. 642, 14 S. W. 682.

A bill in equity will not lie to restrain defendant from interfering with complainant's rights in certain lands, and from moving back upon her lots a fence which she claims stands upon the true line, where the land in dispute has never been adjudged to belong to the complainant, and each party claims a legal right thereto, as the purpose of the action, which is to establish a boundary line, may be secured by an action at law. Andries v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 105 Mich. 557, 63 N. W. 526.

But in F. H. Wolf Brick Co. v. Lonyo, 132 Mich. 162, 102 Am. St. Rep. 412, 93 N. W. 251, it was held that one in possession of land was entitled to enjoin the removal of his fence by an adjoining owner, who threatened to construct one upon another line; and that a bill in such case should not be dismissed upon the ground that there is a dispute as to the boundary line, which should be tried in an action at law. The preceding case of Andries v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. was distinguished on the ground that the rule there laid down applies where there is a well-recognized dispute as to the true boundary line, which it is the purpose of the bill to ascertain and establish, but not where, as in the instant case, the complainant was in possession, claiming as owner, and the line on which the fence was built had been recognized and acquiesced in as the true line for from twenty to thirty years without dispute, until defendant undertook to remove it by force.

There is not such a confusion of boundary as to call for equitable interference to prevent the erection of a fence upon a disputed line, where the boundary line is definite and can be readily located, and the whole difficulty results from two different surveys varying from each other in their conclusions. Harvey v. Miller, 24 App. D. C. 51.

4. Protecting possession of trespasser.

One who, having neither the title to nor possession of land, enters thereon and places persons in occupation of a house on the premises, and builds a fence on what he claims to be the boundary line, which was torn down by the lawful occupant, who causes the trespassers to be forcibly removed, and maintains possession with a force of men too large to resist, is not entitled to injunctive relief. Littlejohn v. Attrill, 94 N. Y. 619. The court said: An injunction to preserve to a wrongdoer the fruit of his wrong, and to shut out the party in possession from his lawful occupation because taken from him by a trespasser, would be the reverse of equity. If the plaintiff or the persons rejected have a right of action their remedy is at law.

A property owner who sets over his fence to what he contends is the true boundary line, and thereby incloses a part of the lot of an adjoining owner in peaceable possession, is a trespasser, and not entitled to enjoin such adjoining owner from interfering with or removing the fence. Currier v. Jones, 121 Iowa, 160, 96 N. W. 766.

5. Motive for erecting or maintaining fence.

One who has destroyed, or has instigated the destruction of, two line fences sufficient for all practical purposes, with the motive of erecting another in order to charge an adjoining owner with its cost, is not entitled to enjoin the latter from interfering with its erection. The plaintiff does not come into equity with clean hands. Auman v. Cunfer, 30 Pa. Super. Ct. 368.

A landowner to whom fence viewers have allotted the duty of maintaining a specified portion of the fence forming the boundary between him and an adjoining proprietor will not be restrained by injunction at the suit of the latter from removing a hedge on such boundary line, for the purpose of replacing it with a wire fence, where the ground on which relief is sought is that the complainant intends to plant an orchard and erect buildings at a point which the hedge would serve to protect. Hill v. Tohill (Ill.) 80 N. E. 253.

d. Enjoining interference with fences under claim of highway or way.

1. General statement.

In this class of cases it should be noted that the fact that fences were interfered with or threatened with injury seems to have had little influence in shaping the decision. Their removal is significant only when they are viewed as visible symbols of ulterior and more important rights, an attack on which is disclosed by their destruction. Fences are like outworks the fate of which is determined by that of the position which they guard. It is with reference to these greater rights represented by them that equitable intervention is exercised or refused.

2. Highways, streets, or alleys.

(a) By public authorities.

(1) To open or change the route of highways.

One having a legal title to, and right of possession of, a tract of land upon which the public, without any legal authority whatever, is claiming an easement in the shape of a highway, may, if his attempts to take possession of the apparent highway and close it up with a fence are resisted by the public authorities, maintain an action for an injunction to restrain them from further interferences with his rights. Oliphant v. Atchison County, 18 Kan. 386. The court observed: We do not decide that this is the only remedy he may pursue, but that it is an adequate and proper one.

But a wrongdoer who has fenced in a street and two alleys cannot successfully invoke the powers of a court of equity to restrain the city from removing the obstructions which, upon proper application by the latter he would be compelled to remove or else be enjoined from maintaining. Heitz v. St. Louis, 110 Mo. 618, 19 S. W. 735.

Equity will not interfere where the remedy at law is adequate or has not been availed of.

Hence, equity will not enjoin the tearing down of fences for the purpose of opening a highway in obedience to the order of the court, lawfully issued, although the commissioners appointed for the purpose of assessing damages assessed none to the plaintiff and made no report on the subject of plaintiff's damages, where the statute affords a remedy by granting an appeal. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maddox, 92 Mo. 469, 4 S. W. 417.

But that supervisors are violating a mandate of the court which directed them to open a proposed highway along a certain location, for which they may be punished for contempt, does not afford such an adequate remedy at law as will prevent injunctive relief to restrain them from wrongfully removing fences and opening a road upon a different location, across the land of the complainant. Kern v. Isgrigg, 132 Ind. 4, 31 N. E. 455.

An injunction to restrain commissioners of highways from changing a county road under an order made for that purpose is properly denied at the suit of landowners, who will have to remove their fences and be subjected to very great inconvenience if the change is made, where the commissioners had jurisdiction to make the order which the complainants failed to take proceedings to review, either by appeal or by writ of certiorari. Equity will not assist those who have failed to avail themselves of the remedies which the law affords. Bailey v. McCain, 92 Ill. 277.

But injunctive relief will be afforded to restrain irreparable injury. Thus, commissioners of highways, who have failed, within the statutory period of five years lacking a day, to open a public road, will be enjoined from entering upon inclosed and cultivated land of the complainant and removing his fences for the purpose of opening up a small portion of the road, where the right of way has not been procured by release from the owners or by payment of the damages assessed for that purpose, nor have the means been provided for their payment, and it is impracticable, within the five years, to open the road and pay the damages. Green v. Green, 34 Ill. 320. The court said: Had the commissioners proceeded to open this portion of the road, it would have been done under color of law, and they could have justified the act in an action for damages. This, then, confers jurisdiction upon a court of equity to prevent an injury for which a recovery could not have been had at law, and brings the case within 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the rule that equity will restrain an act which, if performed, would produce irreparable wrong and injury.

So, township officers who attempt to remove a fence and permanently occupy a strip of the plaintiff's land for a public highway against his will and without having acquired a lawful right thus to use it by proceedings taken for that purpose under the statute will be enjoined. The ground upon which relief is granted in such a case is that the attempt to enter upon and take permanent possession of land for public use without the assent of the owner, and without the damages having been ascertained and paid or tendered, is, or would be if consummated, in the nature of an irreparable injury, for the prevention of which the writ of injunction constitutes the proper remedy. Uren v. Walsh, 57 Wis. 98, 14 N. W. 902.

Injunction is the proper remedy where a town proposes to tear down and remove gates, and wrongfully appropriate agricultural land for a road or street, under color or right, without assessment and tender of compensation to the owner. Hardinsburg v. Cravens, 148 Ind. 1, 47 N. E. 153.

An injunction is the proper remedy to prevent city officers from entering upon residence property and removing therefrom the fences, trees, and improvements, and using the same as a street under color of right, before just compensation has been assessed and tendered therefor. New Albany v. White, 100 Ind. 206.

The destruction of fences, removal of fruit and ornamental trees, and entry upon land, by a road overseer for the purpose of laying out a public road under an order of the county court, without any tender of compensation or assessment of damages, when required by law and not waived by the party, afford good ground for injunctive relief. Carpenter v. Grisham, 59 Mo. 247.

So, commissioners of highways who have failed to adjust the damages incident to the opening of a road through inclosed and cultivated lands as required by statute will be restrained by injunction from entering thereon and removing the fences. Highway Comrs. v. Durham, 43 Ill. 86. The court said: By attempting to open the road in the absence of this adjustment, the commissioners might inflict an injury upon the landowner of the most serious character, which the tardy process of the law could but poorly remedy, and which demanded the instant appeal to the restraining arm of a court of chancery. His remedy was not adequate at law; it was not prompt, such as the emergency required; and in that court he could obtain no adequate relief. By delays there his fence and his crops might be destroyed and his peace violated to such an extent that pecuniary compensation would not relieve.

Injunctive relief is also appropriate where the statute fails to provide for compensation. Thus, a property owner is entitled to enjoin a township officer from taking down his fence for the purpose of opening a highway, and leaving his crops exposed without protection, where the statute under which the road was sought to be established made no provision for compensation to the owners through whose premises roads established thereunder were located, and no compensation has been paid or tendered. Carbon Coal & Min. Co. v. Drake, 26 Kan. 345.

But one who has torn down the fences of another and threatened to continue to do so should not be enjoined where, acting under color of authority of the board of supervisors, he entered on the land, which had been duly condemned to public use for the purpose of opening a public highway, and the compensation to which the owner was entitled had been duly ascertained and tendered to him, but had been refused. In such a case neither great nor irreparable injury is shown, nor any injury whatever. Creanor v. Nelson, 23 Cal. 464.

In Bolster v. Catterlin, 10 Ind. 117, it was decided that a landowner alleging that the defendant, as supervisor of the district, had commenced tearing down and removing his fences, and threatened and intended to move the road which had been established for more than twenty years some 20 feet east of its present location, and that plaintiff had made improvements, built his house, and planted ornamental trees, with a view to the road as originally opened, is not entitled to injunctive relief where it does not appear that the proposed change will impair the value or enjoyment of the plaintiff's farm, since an intent to commit a naked trespass is simply averred,—one not irreparable, but the subject of full recompense in damages.

And in a subsequent case in the same state it was laid down that an allegation that public officers under a void order of the county commissioners threatened to remove the fences of the plaintiff for the purpose of opening a highway through his cultivated lands avers simply an intent to commit a trespass, which may be recompensed in damages, and does not authorize injunctive relief. Lewis v. Rough, 26 Ind. 398. The reason for this decision is thus expressed by the court: The real difficulty in these cases is to determine what is irreparable mischief. It is not, however, difficult to determine that the threatened injury is not an irreparable one. The act threatened is the removal of fences for the purpose of opening a pretended highway through the lands of the plaintiff.

But a more liberal view was taken in Erwin v. Fulk, 94 Ind. 235, where an injunction was granted to restrain the execution of a void order of a board of commissioners directing a change in a highway where the proposed change would divide the plaintiff's farm into two parcels of irregular shape, requiring great changes in his fencing, would divide into separate parcels a large bearing orchard, would pass on the side or end instead of the front of his buildings, and would destroy his pastures and growing crops. The injury was considered not only a continuous one, but one that could not be fully measured in damages.

And in Morgan v. Miller, 59 Iowa, 481, 13 N. W. 643, it was determined that equity ought to take cognizance of a threatened injury of this nature. An injunction to restrain a road supervisor, who had been ordered by the board of supervisors to open a road, was awarded at the suit of a property owner whose lands were affected thereby, and who claimed that the action of the board was void, where notice had been given to some of the landowners along the route to remove their fences. It was said that the complainant was not bound to wait until his fences had been torn down, his fields thrown open, and a right of action had accrued to him at law, but that he might invoke the aid of equity to prevent the threatened invasion of his rights.

Relief may also be accorded by injunction to prevent oppressive and ruinous litigation. In Mason City Salt & Min. Co. v. Mason, 23 W. Va. 211, it was held that a lot owner is entitled to an injunction restraining municipal officers from removing his fences and building for the purpose of opening streets and alleys through his property, against his consent and without lawfully condemning the property or making compensation therefor, on the ground that the plaintiff had no adequate remedy at law for the wrong complained of. Said the court: Actions of trespass, brought against the persons passing over or using said streets and alleys after the defendant had taken them for public use would have been almost infinite in number, and practically endless and ruinous to the plaintiff. Such a case is one clearly appropriate for the interposition of a court of chancery, which, only, is capable of affording adequate relief.

But in Highway Comrs. v. Green, 156 Ill. 504, 41 N. E. 154, the court refused to enjoin commissioners of highways, at the suit of a landowner, from tearing down and removing fences and opening a highway through his farm, on the ground that a multiplicity of suits would be thereby prevented. This decision is based on the principle that equity will not interfere to prevent continued suits between two single individuals, arising from the separate repetition of trespasses, where the right has not been established at law.

Injunctive relief will be denied on the ground that there is a complete remedy at law, where the insolvency of the defendant is not shown.

The tearing down and removal of fences by commissioners of highways for the purpose of opening a highway through complainant's farm will not be enjoined where it is not alleged that the commissioners are insolvent. Highway Comrs. v. Green, supra.

But in Missouri, where it is not essential that the injury threatened shall be irreparable to warrant a resort to equity, an injunction may properly issue to prevent a town from appropriating plaintiff's land, tearing down his fences, and destroying his crops for the purpose of opening a road, although there is no allegation or proof of the insolvency of the defendants, or of the irreparable nature of the threatened injury. Harris v. Gomer Twp. 22 Mo. App. 462.

Similarly, in McPike v. West, 71 Mo. 199, where an injunction was granted to prevent the unlawful opening of a road by road overseers, and the removal of hedges and fences for that purpose, whereby crops would be exposed to the depredations of all kinds of stock, it was held that the insolvency of the defendants need not be averred.

The removal of fences by an insolvent official may be restrained.

Thus, in Grisby v. Burnett, 31 Cal. 406, an injunction was granted restraining an insolvent person, acting under the authority of a board of supervisors, from removing the plaintiff's fences crossing the line of a public road laid out over his land by such board, where an action to ascertain the plaintiff's damages was pending and undetermined, and by removing the fences the plaintiff's crops of grain and grass, and his orchard and vineyard, which were of great value, would be destroyed. The court said: "There is no question raised in respect to the case falling properly within the equitable cognizance of the court."

An injunction will issue against the supervisors of a county and the road overseer of the district, who is insolvent, restraining repeated and continued trespasses by breaking down the inclosure about plaintiff's tract of land and entering thereon to dig up and remove soil, trample down and destroy the grass and other crops, and cut down trees, with the avowed intention of constructing a public road, established by a decree of the court in a partition action covering the premises, and rendered nearly fourteen years previous, but which had never been opened or used, where, by statute, a road not worked or used for five years ceases to be a highway for any purpose whatever. Myers v. Daubenbiss, 84 Cal. 1, 23 Pac. 1027.

An insolvent road overseer will be enjoined from tearing down and removing a fence for the purpose of opening a road, where the order of the county court under which he acted was made without notice to the parties, and was absolutely void. Monroe v. Crawford, 163 Mo. 178, 63 S. W. 373.

And even a solvent officer will be enjoined where he threatens to inflict irreparable injury.

A public officer, although solvent, will be restrained from tearing down a landowner's fence for the purpose of opening a public highway through the land, where in fact no highway has ever been established, since the trespass is one which disturbs the owner's possession, and will, if permitted to continue, ripen into an easement. The threatened loss of the land constitutes irreparable injury. Poirier v. Fetter, 20 Kan. 27.

down fences and seek to appropriate land for highway purposes. The character of the impending injury affords ample ground for the interposition of a court of equity, if the landowner's right has not been legally divested for the public benefit. A permanent appropriation of a portion of his inheritance is threatened; a complete and entire divestiture of all his rights in and control over it. No injury to land could be more irreparable, for it is the extinguishment of the estate itself.

Public officers who attempt, in excess of their statutory authority, to lay out a highway through the buildings, yard, or inclosure of the plaintiff, will be enjoined from removing his fence or opening the highway through his inclosure or buildings. The court remarks: It is well settled that when public officers threaten to take possession of private property and appropriate it permanently to a public use, in violation of law, a court of equity will interfere to prevent such appropriation. Smart v. Hart, 75 Wis. 471, 44 N. W. 514.

The jurisdiction of a court of equity to afford preventive relief by injunction is clear and undoubted where commissioners of highways are threatening to break down and remove fences, and to appropriate complainant's land to the use of the public for a highway, at a place where there is no highway of right. Proposed acts of this kind would constitute a continuing trespass, and might cause irreparable injury. Willett v. Woodhams, 1 Ill. App. 411.

A court of equity may intervene to restrain township officers from continuing to tear down the fences of the complainant under pretense of opening a highway, since such acts, if wrongful, would constitute a continuing trespass, might cause irreparable mischief, perhaps lead to continuing strife in the assertion and maintenance of what the parties may deem their respective rights, and ultimately produce serious breaches of the peace and acts of violence. McIntyre v. Storey, 80 Ill. 127.

One who has built a fence near the line of his land, allowing 14 feet for his portion of the road, is entitled, on the ground of irreparable injury, to a perpetual injunction restraining township trustees from tearing down the fence and taking possession of a strip of land 33 feet in width. Troy Twp. Trustees v. Shauck, 33 Ohio L. J. 251.

It is within the jurisdiction of equity to restrain highway officers from trespassing upon the lands of a private person under the claim that it is a public highway, where they threaten forcibly to enter and destroy his fences and plow up and grade his land. Lawrence v. Kirby (Mich.) 13 Det. L. N. 580, 108 N. W. 770.

The act of a road overseer who wrongfully tears away a fence with the intent of taking land for highway purposes constitutes an irreparable injury amounting to an extinguishment of the estate itself, and calls for the interference of a court of equity by writ of injunction. Rosenberger v. Miller, 61 Mo. App. 422.

And an injunction will lie to restrain a road overseer from tearing down fences, destroying fruit and ornamental trees, and entering upon land for the purpose of laying out a public road, although the order of the county court appointing him is sufficient to protect him, as to acts done in good faith, from liability as a trespasser. The fact that he could not be sued at law would be a good reason for affording this remedy to prevent the unlawful commission of injuries of a permanent and irreparable character constituting an extinguishment of the estate itself, and for which there would otherwise be no redress. Carpenter v. Grisham, 59 Mo. 247.

An injunction will be granted to restrain the removal of a fence by a road overseer, and the opening of a highway across the plaintiff's lands, since such acts would deprive the owner of the use of his property in the character in which he has been holding and enjoying it. Peterson v. Hopewell, 55 Neb. 670, 76 N. W. 451.

One who, with her grantors, has been in the actual, exclusive, and continued possession of lots for over fifty years, during which time the city has never opened, or attempted to open, an alleged street through the premises, which have been long inclosed and cultivated, is entitled to enjoin the city, which has thrown down the fences and opened the land to public use, from molesting or obstructing her in the enjoyment of the property. Forsyth v. Wheeling, 19 W. Va. 318. The court said: "While a person or corporation will not be enjoined from committing a mere trespass, the remedy at law being complete and adequate, yet, where any act is about to be done, permanent in its nature and affecting the very substance and value of the plaintiff's estate, a court of equity will interpose by injunction to prevent the act."

So, injunction is a proper remedy to restrain a city seeking, under color of its chartered powers, to take possession of a strip of land to which it has no right, forming part of an inclosure of a lot owner, with intent to make it a part of the street, thereby inflicting a continuous and permanent injury upon the complainant. Peoria v. Johnston, 56 Ill. 45.

A court of equity has jurisdiction to enjoin a municipal corporation from pulling down a fence and opening up and using a strip of land as a public street without the owner's consent, where the property has never been condemned, dedicated, or used as a street. Baya v. Lake City, 44 Fla. 401, 33 So. 400.

Where proceedings taken to acquire land for highway purposes are invalid, the removal of fences to construct the alleged highway will be enjoined.

Injunction is the proper remedy to prevent the tearing down of fences and the cutting down of trees by a road overseer for the purpose of establishing a public road 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

under invalid condemnation proceedings. Rosenberger v. Miller, supra; Jones v. Zink, 65 Mo. App. 409.

In Floyd v. Turner, 23 Tex. 292, an injunction was granted to restrain a road overseer from throwing down and removing buildings and fences and constructing a road over the plaintiff's premises, where it was alleged that none had been established according to law. On this state of facts, the supreme court held that a motion to dissolve the injunction was improperly sustained.

Nor is it necessary that the party threatened with injury establish his right to redress by an action at law before bringing his bill to restrain by injunction a road overseer, acting under an invalid order of the county court directing him to open a road, from tearing down fences and committing other injuries to the land. Carpenter v. Grisham, 59 Mo. 247.

It seems that an injunction will not lie unless the proceedings are totally void,—that is, so defective as to be a mere nullity; nor where the party has an adequate remedy by appeal or at law.

That there are some variances between the description of the route embraced in the petition to the board of commissioners for the laying out of a highway and the one reported as having been marked and staked out by the viewers does not justify injunctive relief against township officers alleged to be insolvent, who threatened to break into plaintiff's inclosures and to destroy sheds and barns in constructing the road, where both descriptions were evidently intended to describe substantially the same route; since the proceedings are not totally void, and the party has an adequate remedy by appeal. Adams v. Harrington, 114 Ind. 66, 14 N. E. 603.

A judgment awarding an injunction restraining the opening of a public road through the land of the plaintiff will be reversed, although it is alleged that the defendant road overseer is threatening to tear down and remove the plaintiff's fences, and to cut down his hedge, and to destroy his growing crops, and to take possession of a portion of his land for highway purposes, where no evidence is given in support of these allegations, which wehe not admitted by the answer; but the case appears to be one where plaintiff is seeking to enjoin a bare trespass on his land, about to take place in the execution of a judgment or order of the county court, void on its face, establishing the road, without showing special circumstances calling for equitable interposition, because in such cases the complainant has generally an adequate remedy at law. Taylor v. Todd, 48 Mo. App. 550.

(2.) To remove encroachments or obstructions.

An injunction to restrain public officers from removing alleged encroachments or obstructions from a highway will be refused where the remedy at law by action or appeal is adequate.

Entry on lands by road commissioners, who throw down fences for the purpose of reopening a road, is a trespass which does not come within the class of injuries that the law considers as irreparable, nor authorize injunctive relief. There is an adequate remedy at law. Nichols v. Sutton, 22 Ga. 369.

Nor will the threatened removal of a fence by highway commissioners be enjoined, where the suit relates only to one single act of trespass, and irreparable damage is not alleged or proved; since in such case there is an adequate remedy at law. Mapes v. Charles, 30 N. Y. S. R. 373, 8 N. Y. Supp. 665.

One who has fenced in an alley running across his premises, and claims that it was temporarily opened under an agreement with the owners of adjoining land that its use was to terminate when another alley was opened, which has since been done, is not entitled to an injunction restraining the city from interfering with the fence. There is no element of equitable jurisdiction. An action of ejectment would settle the question; or an action of trespass for tearing down the fence would be equally effective. O'Neil v. McKeesport, 201 Pa. 386, 50 Atl. 920.

An injunction will not issue to prevent the removal, by commissioners of highways, of a fence found by a jury of freeholders to be an encroachment upon the highway, even though the proceedings to procure the removal of the fence were without jurisdiction and void; since the plaintiff has a perfect remedy at law, by an action for trespass against the wrongdoer for all damages he may have sustained. Hyatt v. Bates, 40 N. Y. 164.

A lot owner who has improved his lot with reference to the line of the street as it has been recognized for more than twenty years, by the erection of a valuable fence, is not entitled to injunctive relief to restrain the city from taking possession of a strip of land from the front of the lot under a claim that it forms part of the street, where he has a plain and adequate remedy by appeal. Sims v. Frankfort, 79 Ind. 446.

But equity will intervene where the trespassing officer is not peculiarly responsible.

An insolvent road commissioner who has repeatedly removed fences from both sides of a field under a claim that the road enters and passes through the field, and who threatens to remove them as often as replaced, will be enjoined on the ground that there is not an adequate remedy at law where it is not proved that a road was ever located or existed at that point. Owens v. Crossett, 105 Ill. 354.

And corporate officers, although solvent, may be restrained from trespassing on private property and wrongfully removing a fence inclosing the grounds of a citizen under a claim that it constitutes an obstruction of the street. Dudley v. Frankfort, 127 L.R.A. (N.S.)

B. Mon. 610. The court observed: It seems that equitable interposition in this and similar cases would be peculiarly appropriate; because it appears from the evidence in this cause, if the trustees and their marshal are permitted to exercise the power and authority claimed by them to tear down inclosures, because they may form an ex parte decision that they obstruct the streets and alleys of the town, they may, upon the same pretext and upon the same reason and ground of authority, tear down the dwellings of the people, and valuable private edifices belonging to the citizens.

It is well settled that equity will intervene where the injuries threatened would be irreparable.

In Wetherell v. Newington, 54 Conn. 67, 5 Atl. 858, an injunction was granted on the ground of irreparable injury, to restrain the selectmen of a town from entering upon private property, cutting down ornamental trees, carrying away fences, digging up the ground, and appropriating a portion of the premises for a road, under an unfounded claim that the strip of land was a part of the public highway. The court observed: It is every day's practice to grant injunctions to restrain the commission of injuries to real estate in cases where the injuries would be irreparable if committed."

So, the use of a road the line of which is diverted by mistake from the true location is permissive, and the removal by a road overseer, as an obstruction, of a fence erected along it, may be enjoined. The threatened act involves a taking of the land for public use, and would inflict irreparable injury. Rosenberger v. Miller, 61 Mo. App. 422.

And in Huffman v. Hall, 102 Cal. 26, 36 Pac. 417, a road overseer was restrained from interfering with a fence claimed by him to obstruct a public road which, it was alleged, had become such by statute by reason of five years' user, where the owner had for more than ten years kept the premises inclosed with a good, substantial fence, thereby showing that any use of it by the public was permissive.

And fence commissioners who have properly taken within the stock-law fence the lands of owners adjoining the stock-law territory at the request of the latter, and have erected gates across the roads where their outside boundaries came, instead of where the boundaries of the stock-law territory would have crossed, are entitled to a restraining order until the hearing, to prevent the road supervisors from tearing down the gates, which it is alleged would result in irreparable injury to the crops in the stock-law territory. Edwards v. Manning Twp. 127 N. C. 62, 37 S. E. 73.

A city will be enjoined from destroying the fences of a lot owner and the fruit and ornamental trees and shrubbery upon the lot, which is occupied by him as a residence, where the pretense for so doing is an unfounded claim that the fences, trees, and shrubbery are within the limits of public streets. These threatened injuries would if inflicted, be irreparable in the legal acceptance of that term. Wilson v. Mineral Point, 39 Wis. 160.

But equity will not interfere to prevent the threatened removal of a fence and storm door by city officers under a claim that they encroach upon a public street, where the threatened damages are trifling and can be easily compensated in money,—especially where the rights of the parties are doubtful and have not been determined at law. Smith v. Oconomowoc, 49 Wis. 694, 6 N. W. 329. This case discloses nothing but a threat on the part of the city under a claim of right, in order to protect its streets from illegal obstructions and encroachments, to do an act which, if not authorized, would be a trespass upon the plaintiff's realty resulting in but slight damages, and not in any way doing what in the law is termed an irreparable injury to his property. The preceding case may be distinguished on the ground that, although the damage threatened in that case might be compensated in money, yet it would involve a destruction of property which could not be restored to its former condition by the labor of man alone, nor with his labor aided by the forces of nature, except after the lapse of many years.

If the threatened injury would be permanent and continuing, equity will intervene.

Injunction is a proper remedy where a city or public officers, under an unfounded claim that a street exists at that point, enter a landowner's inclosure, tear down his fence, prevent him by force from repairing it, and deposit lumber upon the ground for the purpose of constructing a sidewalk across the premises, which would inflict a permanent and continuing injury. Bryan v. East St. Louis, 12 Ill. App. 390.

And one who has maintained his fences in the same place for over forty years is entitled, for the prevention of further mischief, to an injunction restraining township officers, who, in order to widen the highway, and under an unfounded claim of authority, have entered upon his property, removed a part of the fence, dug away the soil, and threatened to remove the buildings and fences, and cut down growing trees. Winslow v. Nayson, 113 Mass. 411.

But an injunction restraining borough authorities from removing as a nuisance a stone wall erected in front of plaintiff's premises should be dissolved where it appears that the wall encroaches upon the street, although its removal would damage plaintiff's property. Walsh v. Olyphant, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 124.

The irreparable nature of the injury complained of must be shown.

An injunction to restrain highway commissioners from removing a fence which had been in the same place for more than twenty years, on the claim that it obstructs a highway, should not be granted in the absence of a showing of irreparable injury. Taylor v. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Pearce, 71 Ill. App. 525, Reversed in 174 Ill. 9, 50 N. E. 1109, on another ground.

Nor will an injunction be issued to restrain the execution of an illegal order of the board of county commissioners directing the supervisor to remove all obstructions from a road, which, if complied with, will bring the road close to the dwelling house of the plaintiff and cut off his front yard, including part of his grapevines and flowers, where, although the supervisor has notified the plaintiff to remove all obstructions, it does not appear that, in obedience to such order, he is about to commit a trespass by tearing down the inclosure or digging up the grapevines and flowers for the purpose of opening the road, and that, if not restrained, his acts will result in the destruction of the estate in the character in which it has been enjoyed. Weiss v. Jackson County, 9 Or. 470.

But in Iowa an injunction will issue to restrain a supervisor of highways from removing a fence along the line of the highway which has been maintained for many years, pending a judicial settlement of the controversy. Relief in such cases is said not to be based upon the grounds of the irreparable character of the injury in opening plaintiff's inclosure and exposing to waste his crops, shrubs, and trees, nor upon the insolvency of the defendant, but upon a sound public policy which demands that, for the protection of both landowner and supervisor, the question of the legality of the supervisor's proposed act should be determined before the injury is done to the farm, or any liability incurred. Bolton v. McShane, 67 Iowa, 207, 25 N. W. 135.

Equity may intervene to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

Injunction is properly granted to restrain a road overseer from entering upon improved land under the direction of the town supervisors, and tearing down fences, cutting down trees, and doing other injuries to the land in accordance with their instructions to keep an alleged highway open at that point, where it has been adjudged that none existed of right, when, in the discharge of his supposed official duty to keep the alleged highway open, it is probable that he will continue to do whatever may be necessary to that end. Chadbourne v. Zilsdorf, 34 Minn. 43, 24 N. W. 308.

To prevent a multiplicity of suits, a road commissioner, who has repeatedly removed fences from both sides of a field under an unsubstantiated claim that the highway enters and passes through it, and who threatens to remove the fences as often as they are replaced, will be restrained by injunction. Owens v. Crossett, 105 Ill. 354.

So, a road overseer who has several times removed gates erected by a landowner to prevent travel over a portion of his premises on which no highway has been legally established may, to avoid a multiplicity of actions for damages, and perhaps breaches of the peace, be enjoined from taking down or removing the gates, where it appears that the trespasses already committed will probably be repeated indefinitely. Smithers v. Fitch, 82 Cal. 153, 22 Pac. 935.

But highway commissioners will not be restrained from removing, as an obstruction of the highway, a fence which had been in the same place for more than twenty years, on the ground of restraining a multiplicity of suits, where a mere repetition of the same trespass by the same person is sought to be avoided, and complainant's rights have not been established at law. Taylor v. Pearce, 71 Ill. App. 525, Reversed in 174 Ill. 9, 50 N. E. 1109, on another ground. The distinction between this and the three preceding cases is that in them the complainant's right had been established.

Equity will not, on the one hand, tolerate a continuing menace to the rights and property of a landowner; nor, on the other, uphold by injunction one who has wrongfully inclosed property over which the public has rights of way.

A municipal corporation which threatens, in pursuance of an invalid ordinance, to remove as an obstruction a fence placed by plaintiff in an alley, may be enjoined, since there is a continuing menace to the rights of the plaintiff, affording a basis for equitable relief. Riley v. Greenwood, 72 S. C. 90, 110 Am. St. Rep. 592, 51 S. E. 532.

But an action to enjoin city officers from removing a fence erected across a piece of ground claimed by the plaintiff as his property, but which the city officers allege is a public street, will be dismissed, although there has never been an acceptance by the city council of the dedication of the property to street purposes as required by statute in order to render the land a public street, where the dedication has become irrevocable, and the city can accept it at any time, and the public has rights of way over the premises of which plaintiff has wrongfully taken possession. Brewer v. Pine Bluff (Ark.) 97 S. W. 1034.

Injunction is an appropriate remedy to protect fences where their removal is threatened, on the ground that they obstruct a highway, by public officers who have not first condemned the property which they seek to appropriate to public use.

One who, after the discontinuance of a road, has inclosed his land and fenced in the road so as to shut off travel over it, and maintained such an obstruction for several years, is entitled to an injunction restraining the town authorities from reopening the road without first condemning the property according to law. In such case injunction is the proper mode of proceeding. Yates v. West Grafton, 33 W. Va. 507, 11 S. E. 8.

Where a public road has been laid out, worked, and used of the width of 40 feet, the rights of an adjacent landowner become fixed by that opening, working, and using, and he is entitled to enjoin the commissioners of highways from enlarging the width at a subsequent period, whereby valuable hedge fences will be swept away without compensation. Highway Comrs. v. Harrison, 108 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ill. 398. The court said: This property could be taken only under some authorized mode of condemning private property for public use.

Adverse user and possession will not, alone, entitle a party to injunctive relief. Other grounds for equitable interference must exist.

An injunction to restrain city authorities from taking for street purposes a strip of land under a claim that it forms part of the street will not be granted at the suit of a lot owner who had improved his lot with reference to the line of the street as it had been recognized for twenty years, by the erection of a valuable fence which the municipal officers permitted to be erected without objection, where it appears that proceedings for the improvement of the street were duly had, and, on survey, the strip of land in question was ascertained to form part of the street as originally applied and dedicated. Sims v. Frankfort, 79 Ind. 446. The court observed: The plaintiff cannot, by such an improvement as shown, acquire title to a public street. Whatever may be the rule where it appears that great expenditures have been made and acts done for which compensation cannot readily be fully made, it is plain that where there has been a small expenditure of money for which full compensation can readily be made title cannot be acquired in a public highway by estoppel.

But in Illinois a city will be enjoined from changing the line of a sidewalk and removing fences as an alleged encroachment, so as to take in a part of the property of a lot owner, and lying within his inclosure, where the location of the street as originally made has been kept for more than forty years, and the city has accepted such location by many acts of recognition, such as building a culvert and graveling the walks. This was considered an appropriate case for injunctive relief by reason of the long possession of the complainant, and the positive acts of the city which were held to estop it from attempting to change the present location of the walk. Joliet v. Werner, 166 Ill. 34, 46 N. E. 780.

The last-cited case was followed in Itasca v. Schroeder, 182 Ill. 192, 55 N. E. 50, in which an injunction was granted to restrain village authorities engaged in changing the roadbed of a street from entering upon complainant's property under a claim that he had encroached upon the highway, from removing his fence, plowing up his land, and cutting his standing trees, where the street as located had been used for over forty years.

In New Jersey, however, an abutting owner is not entitled to injunctive relief against municipal authorities who, for the purpose of opening a street to its lawful width, are about to remove a fence and destroy a hedge of arbor vitae, and cut down evergreen and elm trees, where the street as claimed was legally laid out, and its boundaries are readily ascertainable by survey, although the complainant has for thirty-seven years adversely occupied the premises. Tainter v. Morristown, 19 N. J. Eq. 46. The court said: The possession for over twenty years can avail the complainant nothing. It is well settled that time does not run against the state, or the public, by analogy to the statute of limitations against individuals, but only where the state or public are expressly included. This is a wise and wholesome principle that I feel no inclination to disregard or to narrow. To protect highways from encroachments that it is the business of one to resist requires that the public be allowed to resume its rights at any distance of time, disregarding any loss to those who have appropriated and erected improvements on the public domain, or to the more innocent purchasers from them.

In Yates v. Warrenton, 84 Va. 337, 10 Am. St. Rep. 860, 4 S. E. 818, an injunction obtained by a lot owner to prevent municipal authorities from removing his fence was dissolved where it appeared that it constituted a nuisance by encroaching upon a dedicated street. It was held that such encroachment was not helped or aided by the lapse of time.

But where the true boundaries of a street are open to serious controversy the municipal authorities are not justified, for the purpose of widening the street, in removing as a public nuisance the fences of an abutting owner prior to an enactment of the proper ordinances sanctioning the improvement. Cross v. Morristown, 18 N. J. Eq. 305. The court said: By the law of this state the complainant cannot set up any claim, derived from a possession continued for over twenty years, to occupy any portion of the public street in question. But, as the true boundaries of this street are open to serious controversy, and as the possession of the complainant has been of such long continuance, it seems to me that the officers of the town, unauthorized to pursue such a course by any ordinance, would not be justified in entering upon the premises of the complainant and removing his fence as a public nuisance. If such was originally the intention of the town officers, the injunction in this respect was proper, and should now be continued.

And one who has for over thirty years been in the undisputed possession of land which has never been used as a street is entitled to an injunction restraining the municipal authorities, who have notified him to remove a fence thereon, and that it he does not do so within a specified time they will proceed to remove the same as an encroachment upon the street. Shields v. Savannah, 55 Ga. 150. In Georgia thirty years' possession is sufficient to give an occupant a perfect title to land; and equitable relief was granted on the ground that to exercise such an act of ownership over the property would cloud the complainant's title.

Equity will not intervene where the adverse occupancy falls short of the statutory period, or where it has never been adverse. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A person who, in fencing his lot, unintentionally encroached on the street, is not entitled to an injunction restraining the municipal authorities from interfering with his fences, trees, and sidewalk, where he has not occupied the premises for a sufficient period to obtain title by adverse possession. Wyman v. St. Johns, 100 Mich. 571, 59 N. W. 241.

One who, in inclosing her lots with a fence, incloses an alley and remains in actual possession of the premises for the statutory limit of ten years, is not entitled to enjoin the municipal authorities from thereafter opening the alley, where her possession was not hostile or adverse, but she had led the authorities to believe that they would meet with no opposition from her in opening the alley whenever they might desire at a time when she would have no crop upon it. Jarvis v. Grafton, 44 W. Va. 453, 30 S. E. 178.

One in possession will be protected by injunction from forcible entry until those disturbing his possession have established a right at law.

City officials who threaten, for the purpose of widening a street in conformity with a plat, to proceed summarily to pull down fences and remove buildings which have been in place for nearly thirty years, will be restrained from so doing until the city establishes its right at law, where the land in question has never been used as a street. Devaux v. Detroit, Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 98.

In Sheldon v. Kalamazoo, 24 Mich. 383, where the marshal of a village, in pursuance of an order of the village board, entered upon the premises of a property owner and threw down his fences on the claim that they occupied part of the street, the court said: Where a person has been in peaceable possession of lands under color and claim of right, it is not consistent with legal policy to allow him to be forcibly ejected without legal process. The courts have interfered to protect continued possession, by the writ of injunction, until the right should be tried at law. And we cannot believe that, under the power to pass ordinances to prevent encroachments and compel their removal, it was designed that corporations, any more than individuals, should violate the public peace.

So, where the plaintiff and those under whom he claims have been in the quiet and uninterrupted possession of a lot of land for twenty-five years and upwards, a city cannot, under pretense that the buildings or fences on such lot stand or encroach on a part of the public street or highway, enter upon or disturb the plaintiff in the enjoyment of the property. An injunction issued to restrain the city from entering upon, digging, throwing down, or destroying, the ground so possessed by the plaintiff, should be made perpetual until the corporation has established, by due course of law, its right to the ground in question. Varick v. New York, 4 Johns. Ch. 55.

If, after land has been surveyed, and before any streets have ever been opened up, a citizen enters into adverse possession of the land, it must be recovered by the municipality in some of the ways known to the law before it can be opened up as a street.

Municipal authorities should be enjoined from removing a fence as an alleged encroachment on a street which has never been actually opened, worked, or used by the public, but exists only on a map of the town as originally laid out, and has been in private occupation for forty years, although the town owns in fee simple the land designated on the map as the place where the street is to be located. Robins v. McGehee (Ga.) 56 S. E. 461.

Nor will a court of equity permit public officers to remove fences where the fact of encroachment is not clear.

The threatened removal of a fence by a board of commissioners as an alleged encroachment upon the street will be restrained, where no resolution or ordinance has been passed directing the removal of the fence as an obstruction, and it does not appear that the board has taken any steps to ascertain whether the alleged encroachment in fact exists. Doughty v. Somerville, 33 N. J. Eq. 1.

A city will be enjoined from changing the line of a street which has been recognized and worked for thirty-five years, when the change involves great expense to the abutting property owners, changes in their property, and a destruction of shade trees and fences, where the evidence is not clear that the street as it exists substantially varies from the legally established line. Delashmut v. Oskaloosa, 94 Iowa, 722, Appx., 62 N. W. 16.

But the refusal of an interlocutory injunction to restrain road commissioners from removing or interfering with gates placed by a landowner across a way is not erroneous, or, at least, is not an abuse of discretion, where a public highway had once existed at that point, and the evidence as to its abandonment is conflicting. Glaze v. Bogle, 97 Ga. 340, 22 S. E. 969.

Nor is it an abuse of discretion to dissolve a temporary injunction restraining town officers, pending the action, from removing fences out of the locus in quo which they claim to be a public highway, where the evidence is conflicting. It requires a very clear case to justify the closing of an alleged highway by an injunction pending a suit to determine whether it is or is not a public highway. Meyer v. Petersburg, 96 Minn. 314, 104 N. W. 899.

(b) By private persons.

Where the legal remedy is adequate equity will not intervene.

That defendants have torn down plaintiff's fences or gate, under a claim that they obstructed a public highway, and have driven a team across his meadow, whereby the grass has been trampled down and destroyed, do not entitle him to injunctive relief, since the injury is susceptible of pecuniary compensation, for which the law affords a prompt, adequate, and complete remedy. Smith v. Gardner, 12 Or. 221, 53 Am. Rep. 342, 6 Pac. 771.

A court of equity will not grant injunctive relief where the bill contains a charge of trespass by entering repeatedly upon the lands of the plaintiff and throwing down his fences under a claim that a highway existed at that point, so that stock of all kinds had access to the fields and destroyed the growing crops thereon, although that part of the plantation which is more immediately exposed is sown down in wheat for the purpose of raising food for the support of the plaintiff's family, and the loss of which, it is alleged, will subject him to great inconvenience and irreparable injury; since, where the defendant is able to respond in damages, the legal remedy is adequate. Catching v. Terrell, 10 Ga. 576. This case cites and follows that of Jerome v. Ross, 7 Johns. Ch. 315, 11 Am. Dec. 484, referred to in II., a, supra. The court remarked: Believing, as we do, that the peculiar circumstances disclosed do not warrant, much less imperatively demand, the conservative remedy invoked, we cannot sustain the injunction. Suppose the plaintiff be prevented entirely from making a crop, the worst that can befall him, it is not pretended but that defendant is abundantly able to respond in money for this deprivation. Even if plaintiff were compelled to employ hands to watch the road fence continually, to put it up as fast as it is pulled down, the hire of these hands, together with smart money might be sufficiently secured by the verdict of a jury. Had it been stated that there was an orchard of fruit trees, or of mulberries for the feeding of the silk worm, which was exposed to the depredation of the stock let into this plantation by reason of the trespass complained of, our conclusion might have been different.

Parties will not be enjoined from breaking down fences erected at the end of an alley to prevent its use by them, under a claim that it is a common alley, where the title to the alley has not been determined at law. The plaintiff's remedy is an action at law. Quinn's Appeal, 9 Sadler (Pa.) 82, 11 Atl. 647.

To entitle a party to invoke the powers of a court of equity, he must show that the remedy at law is inadequate.

An injunction should be dissolved which restrains the defendant from taking down a fence and passing over land, although the plaintiff's title is not in dispute, where it is claimed that a public highway exists at that point, and neither insolvency of the defendant, nor irreparable injury not susceptible of complete pecuniary compensation, is shown. Lazzell v. Garlow, 44 W. Va. 466, 30 S. E. 171.

A lot owner who complains of the removal of posts erected by him across an alleged street running through his land, and the passing and repassing over the same of vehicles, is not entitled to injunctive relief in the absence of an averment of irreparable injury, and when the defendant denies the allegation that she is insolvent, but avers that she has property amply sufficient to meet any damage which may be awarded against her. Frink v. Stewart, 94 N. C. 484.

But a grantor alleged to be insolvent, who repeatedly tears down a fence inclosing the land as described in a deed executed by him for the purpose of opening up a street, and begins to grade and plow the land for that purpose, claiming that a strip 30 feet wide for a road was reserved from the land sold, but not excepted in the conveyance by reason of mistake, will be restrained from further trespassing unless he gives bonds to pay all damages which the grantee may sustain, to be determined in an action therefor. Rubsam v. Cobb, 84 Ga. 552, 11 S. E. 138.

An injunction to restrain the removal by the defendant of a pair of bars opening into a lane, and which he claims obstruct a highway, whereby the plaintiff's fields are left unprotected and his cattle permitted to escape, will not be granted, although the defendant is insolvent, since the injury apprehended is not serious nor in its nature irreparable,—and especially where the main object of the suit is to settle the title. Morgan v. Palmer, 48 N. H. 336.

But the lawful owner in possession of land which he has cleared and inclosed and cultivated is entitled to injunctive relief against a trespasser who, falsely pretending there is a public highway over said land, has pulled out gate posts, cut the wire of the fence, passed over the land, and threatened to kill the complainant if he does not keep out of his way, and to cut down the fence every time it is repaired. Stroup v. Chalcraft, 52 Ill. App. 608. The court observed: A stronger case is seldom shown requiring the aid of a court of equity to prevent irreparable injury and a multiplicity of suits. It would be unjust to withhold equitable aid and compel complainant to prosecute repeated suits to recover damages for the threatened trespass. Irreparable injury authorizing the interference of a court of chancery by injunction need not always be such injury as is beyond the possibility of repairs, or beyond possible compensation in damages, nor necessarily great injury or great damage, but that species of injury, great or small, that ought not to be submitted to on the one hand, or inflicted on the other, and is of constant and frequent recurrence, so that no fair or reasonable redress can be had therefor in a court of law. The law may afford a remedy in a given case; but, if, as in this case, it is not an adequate remedy, equity will interfere, and in one proceeding, by its decree, grant full relief, and furnish a more complete and efficient remedy than the injured party could obtain by resort to vexatious and protracted litigation and prosecuting a multiplicity of suits at great expense.

And one whose fences have been repeatedly torn down and cut by another, claiming that there is a public highway across the premises, and who threatens to continue to do so, is entitled to relief in equity by an injunction for the avoidance of a multiplicity of suits, regardless of whether the defendant is solvent or insolvent. Ladd v. Osborne, 79 Iowa, 93, 44 N. W. 235.

So, an injunction will lie to restrain the tearing down of a fence by private persons under a claim that it obstructs a highway, when it has been repeatedly done, and a repetition of the wrongful acts is threatened. Shaffer v. Stull, 32 Neb. 94, 48 N. W. 882. The court said that to require the plaintiff to bring an action at law every time the injury was repeated would not be an adequate remedy. He is entitled to relief in equity by injunction in order to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

Equity will entertain an action brought to stay by injunction the commission of repeated trespasses by the defendant in removing a fence upon the plaintiff's land, where the latter's title is undisputed, and the only question is upon the right of the defendant to commit the acts complained of under a claim that the land has been dedicated to highway purposes. Carpenter v. Gwynn, 35 Barb. 395.

But where the evidence as to the existence of the highway is irreconcilable and antagonistic, equity will not restrain defendants from destroying fences and trespassing upon the lands of the plaintiff under a claim that a highway exists at that place. Smith v. Gardner, 12 Or. 221, 53 Am. Rep. 342, 6 Pac. 771.

One who has opened a private court to furnish access to his buildings and factories is entitled to enjoin its use by others who have forcibly destroyed a fence erected by him, and claimed the right to use the court for access to the rear of their factory with horses and wagons, on the ground that it is a public highway. In the absence of a substantial dispute as to the rights of the parties, injunctive relief may be granted without first requiring complainant's title to be established at law. Robertson v. Meyer, 50 N. J. Eq. 366, 45 Atl. 983.

But a threatened trespass will not be enjoined where the plaintiff fails to show title in himself to the property affected.

One who has made out, acknowledged, and filed a map of a town site by which streets and alleys designated thereon are dedicated to public use can no longer claim title to the strips of land so dedicated, and is not entitled to the aid of a court of equity to enjoin, from further trespassing upon the land, one who has proceeded to cut down and remove a hedge and wire fence which extended across one of the designated streets for the purpose of opening the road for travel; since the plaintiff is not threatened with anything but the loss of possession, to which he is not entitled. Harden v. Metz, 10 Kan. App. 341, 58 Pac. 281, Affirmed in 62 Kan. 867, 63 Pac. 1126.

A property owner will not be enjoined from maintaining a gate by means of which he obtains access to an alley, at the suit of one who claims that he has no right to use the same as a passageway, where the plaintiff's right has not been established at law, or is not clear, or is questioned on every ground on which he puts it. Kelly v. Long, 7 Phila. 455.

It is not the province of a court of equity to protect an individual in the violation of law. One who erects a fence within the lines of a public highway is not entitled to an injunction restraining persons having a right to use the highway for the purposes or travel from tearing down and removing the fence. Johnson v. Maxwell, 2 Wash. 482, 27 Pac. 1071.

3. Private road.

An injunction will issue to restrain one acting under the authority of a board of supervisors which made a void order establishing a private road over plaintiff's land from destroying fences and valuable fruit trees. Such a trespass constitutes an injury to the inheritance, and is clearly a matter for equitable interference. Silva v. Garcia, 65 Cal. 591, 4 Pac. 628.

But an injunction will not issue to restrain one acting under the authority of the board of supervisors of a county, who has entered upon the plaintiff's lands and laid out a private road, from tearing down fences obstructing the way, where no reasons are given why plaintiff has not an adequate remedy at law. Leach v. Day, 27 Cal. 643.

4. Private way.

As to injunctive relief to prevent the obstruction of private ways by fences or gates, see III., c. infra.

In Washburn v. Miller, 117 Mass. 376, an injunction to restrain one who had taken down the fence along a private way and committed various trespasses thereon was denied in the absence of an averment of irreparable damage, or of any facts indicating that damages would not adequately compensate the plaintiff, and when no suit at law had been brought by the plaintiff to establish his right to the way, but the defendant had brought an action against the plaintiff for interference with him in the use of the way.

And in Hacker v. Barton, 84 Ill. 313, a bill, although alleging that defendants have committed trespasses and removed the inclosure of the plaintiff's lot, thereby inflicting irreparable mischief, was dismissed, but without prejudice, so that the plaintiff might assert his rights at law, where the defendants claimed the right to use a private way over the lot which it was alleged the plaintiff wrongfully inclosed, and the evidence was conflicting.

But an injunction restraining one who has destroyed a portion of a fence inclosing a lot, and who threatens to destroy it as often as it is rebuilt, should be granted in order that the issue as to the private way may be determined by a jury, where the defendant claims a right of way over the property, which is denied by the plaintiffs, and the evidence is conflicting. English v. Jones, 108 Ga. 123, 34 S. E. 122.

Injunction to compel closing of gates.

In an action by a railroad company to enjoin the owner of a farm intersected by a railroad from leaving open the gates of a private railway crossing, the court held that the defendant should be required to keep the gates closed at all times except when the crossing was being actually used in good faith by persons who were passing over it or driving stock over it, where stock on the farm would otherwise have free access to the crossing. Truesdale v. Jensen, 91 Iowa, 312, 59 N. W. 47. The reason for the decision is thus stated: The stock frequently stops on the crossing and interferes with the running of trains. Serious accidents have been threatened from that cause, and barely avoided on several occasions. While to permit the gates to remain open, and thus to allow his stock to have an unobstructed passageway from his yards to the fields and from the fields to water would save him some care and labor, yet the interests jeopardized by such a course are so great that we think it should not be permitted.

And a railway company is entitled to an injunction restraining a property owner from destroying, injuring, or leaving open gates erected at a farm crossing over the company's track. The company need not wait until it has suffered great injury before attempting to vindicate its right. Axthelm v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 2 Neb. (Unof.) 444, 89 N. W. 313. The court, in its opinion, refers to the preceding case, and says: The company need not wait until it has suffered great injury before attempting to vindicate its right. It is held in Truesdale v. Jensen, supra, that it is sufficient that it is charged that defendant persisted in leaving the gates open. The company and defendant are joint occupiers of the premises, and jointly in charge of the gates, and the use of the writ of injunction to prevent a wrongful use by the defendant, in view of the important interests concerned, seems eminently proper. The claim of error in this particular cannot be sustained.

The owner of a lot subject to a right of way, but who has the right to maintain gates at the points of ingress and egress, is entitled to an injunction restraining the use of the right of way except on condition that the party using the way properly and securely closes and fastens the gates immediately after passing through them, where an intention is shown to continue the injurious acts. Mendelson v. McCabe, 144 Cal. 230, 103 Am. St. Rep. 78, 77 Pac. 915. The court said the right to injunctive relief is not defeated by the mere absence of substantial damage, but may be based upon the invasion of the right to maintain the gates and the necessity of an injunction to prevent a total destruction of the right, since the acts of plaintiff in leaving the gates open, if persisted in for a sufficient length of time, would ripen into a right by prescription.

In Brandis v. Grissom, 26 Ind. App. 661, 60 N. E. 455, an injunction was granted restraining one from leaving open, during certain months of the year, gates erected across a right of way, and who threatened to continue the acts complained of.

So, one entitled to maintain gates at the points of ingress and egress to a private way may, for the purpose of preventing a multiplicity of actions, enjoin its use except on condition that the gates be securely closed and fastened immediately after passing through them. Mendelson v. McCabe, supra. The court said: The only remedy, other than that of an injunction, for the injury arising from such continued trespass, would be an action against the person using the way for damages upon each occasion when he left the gates open. The damages in each case would be very small, probably insufficient to defray the expenses of maintaining the action, not recoverable as costs. Such remedy is inadequate, and would require numerous petty suits, which it is not the policy of the law to encourage.

In Bean v. Coleman, 44 N. H. 539, a suit to enjoin one having a right of way reserved in general terms over land from leaving open gates, the court intimated that it was incumbent on the defendant to keep the gate on the dividing line between the land of the parties shut, except when passing through it, as much as it was his duty to keep the remainder of his half of the fence in repair; that his having a right of way over the plaintiff's land would not justify him in leaving this gate open except when he was passing through it, any more than it would in leaving any other part of his fence down; that this gate was there like any other part of the division fence in all respects, except that the defendant might open it and pass through as he had occasion, into the path on the plaintiff's lands, without becoming a trespasser, as he would be if he opened any other part of the plaintiff's fence and passed through there: but an injunction was refused to compel him to close, between August 1 and December 1, a gate erected by plaintiff across the right of way, where the right to maintain it was disputed, and had not been established at law, and when no irreparable damage or mischief was threatened.

e. Extent or form of relief.

See also III., e, infra.

An injunction may issue to compel the restoration of fences or hedges.

In Bidwell v. Holden, 63 L. F. N. S. 104, a lessee, who had filled in ditches and broken down a hedge which the lessor was under obligation to maintain, was directed by mandatory injunction to restore and replace the ditches, with their banks and hedges.

And, on the dissolution of an injunction restraining interference with plaintiff's possession of disputed lands, and from building a fence inclosing them, where he has, pending the suit, torn down fences previously erected by the defendant, and erected another inclosing such lands with other land of his own, he should be required to restore things to the same condition, as nearly as possible, as they were when the order for the injunction was made. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Taylor, 134 Ill. 603, 25 N. E. 588. The court said: To allow one party to obtain any advantage by acting when the hands of the adverse party are thus tied by the writ or the order for it is an abuse of legal process which cannot be tolerated. It is immaterial in whom is the legal title, or whether, when appellant built its fence, it was a trespasser or lawfully in possession.

But a mandatory injunction to compel the restoration of a fence should be refused where its effect would be to give a party an undue advantage. Thus, a preliminary injunction against interference by the authorities of a city with the possession by a railroad company of a wharf claimed to be part of a public street cannot require such authorities to replace the tracks which they have torn up, and restore a fence torn down by them, where the effect of such restoration will be to give the railroad company an exclusive possession which it did not have at the commencement of the suit. The sole object of an interlocutory injunction is to preserve the subject of controversy in the condition in which it is when the order is made. If it takes, or permits the taking, from a defendant anything he has, it would anticipate and forejudge the merits of the controversy, and transcend the purpose of a preliminary injunction. It would exert, as was said in Murdock's Case, 2 Bland, Ch. 469, 20 Am. Dec. 381, infra, before final hearing, the remedial as well as conservative powers of the court. Southern P. R. Co. v. Oakland, 58 Fed. 50.

The only function of a preliminary injunction is to stay threatened action and suspend the conflicting claims of the respective parties until they can be properly adjudicated.

Hence, in Murdock's Case, 2 Bland, Ch. 469, 20 Am. Dec. 381, where an injunction prohibiting a trespasser from continuing the erecting of a fence upon plaintiff's land, and enjoining him to remove the fence already erected, was asked, the court refused to require, by preliminary injunction, the removal of that part of the fence which had been built. The court said: We are asked by the plaintiff at once to put forth in his behalf the remedial as well as the conservative powers of this court. To order a defendant to pull down or remove any erection would be obviously and directly to deprive him of a portion of that which then, at least, appeared to be his property, and was so claimed by him; and that, too, at once and without a hearing; for a house, a fence, or the like has a value, as such, which would be totally destroyed by its being pulled down, and which does not belong to the materials of which it was composed, however carefully they may be preserved. The only object of the conservative power of the court, as expressed in an injunction of this kind, is not to determine any controverted right, but merely to prevent a threatened wrong, or any further perpetration of injury, or the doing of any act thereafter whereby the right to a thing may be embarrassed, or endangered, or whereby its value may be materially lessened, or the thing itself may be totally lost. The principal object of an injunction, in cases of this kind, is to prevent irreparable injury by preserving things in their present state; but, if the injunction were to order anything to be pulled down or undone, it is obvious that it might be itself used as a means of producing that very kind of irreparable injury to the defendant which the bill charged him with being about to perpetrate against the plaintiff.

One from whom a railroad company had purchased land for the erection of a depot, but who had never executed a deed of the property, and claims that the purchase price has never been paid, and who is in possession, should not, until the question of title is adjudicated, be permanently enjoined from interfering with or interrupting the company in the full and free enjoyment of the use and possession of the premises, nor should the writ confer upon the latter the right to remove fences now or hereafter placed on the premises by the vendor, who had erected a fence inclosing the land in dispute. The office of an injunction, under the Code, is merely to restrain, and not to compel the performance of an act. Beacham v. Wrightsville & T. R. Co. 125 Ga. 362, 54 S. E. 157.

In an action under the "burnt records act" to determine in whom the title to lands is vested, the court, for the purpose of preserving the property in tact, may, by preliminary injunction, restrain the building of houses and fences on the lands in controversy. Harding v. Fuller, 40 Ill. App. 643.

A preliminary injunction will not lie to redress an injury already done by a removal of a boundary fence and hydrant, or the erection of a wall. Whitman v. Shoemaker, 2 Pearson (Pa.) 320. The reason for the decision is thus expressed; An injunction will not lie to redress an injury already done. The office of a preliminary injunction is to restrain. It is not mandatory in its character, and cannot command things to be undone which have already been done and completed. It will, therefore, not enable the court to order the fence and hydrant to be restored, or the wall, if wrongfully erected, to be pulled down. It can restrain all further acts of injury from being committed.

A preliminary injunction restraining a person from building a fence inclosing a strip of land as to which the title is in dispute is improvidently granted, where the fence had been built before the bill was 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

filled; and the writ should be dissolved on the hearing. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Taylor, 134 Ill. 503, 25 N. E. 588.

Where a fence had been pulled down before the filing of a bill, an injunction should not issue. Shell v. Kemmerer, 13 Phila. 502.

A suit in equity to restrain wrongful interference with the plaintiff's use of her estate cannot be maintained for past trespasses, which consisted in part in the removal of a fence from an alleged right of way. O'Brien v. Murphy, 189 Mass. 353, 75 N. E. 700.

So, an injunction will not issue against one who has broken the plaintiff's inclosure, seized his crops, torn down his buildings, and permitted his cattle to run upon the place, where the acts have already been done, and the damages have been incurred and are ascertainable. Ewing v. Rourke, 14 Or. 514, 13 Pac. 483.

But that one who entered upon premises in the peaceable possession of another had inclosed a portion of the lot with a fence and turned thereon a number of hogs before the injunction restraining him was actually issued does not render the remedy unavailing, since no one can found possession on a tortious trespass alone; nor can anyone acquire a right by the commission of a wrong. Carter v. Warner, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 688, 89 N. W. 747.

In a proper case chancery will award a perpetual, instead of a preliminary, injunction.

A city which seeks without right to take possession of the inclosure of a lot owner for the purpose of making it a part of the street need not merely be enjoined until the rights of the parties can be settled at law, but chancery, having acquired jurisdiction, may properly administer relief by perpetually enjoining the acts complained of. Peoria v. Johnston, 56 Ill. 45.

And a road overseer acting under an order of the county court, invalid for failure to comply with the statutory requirements as to the assessment and tender of damages, is properly perpetually enjoined from entering upon land for the purpose of laying out a public road, and from tearing down fences, destroying fruit and ornamental trees, where it is too late to assess damages in the proceeding so as to give validity to the action of the county court. Carpenter v. Grisham, 59 Mo. 247.

But to entitle a party to relief it must be prayed for.

A temporary injunction cannot be granted to restrain a tenant in possession of a house and dooryard from interfering with the crops, fences, or buildings upon the adjoining farming lands, where the only relief prayed is for the possession of the house and yard, since a temporary injunction cannot be granted to restrain the doing of acts in relation to property, in respect to which acts or property no final judgment is prayed. Hulce v. Thompson, 8 How. Pr. 475.

III. Injunctive relief on ground of nuisance.

a. Introductory.

Injunctive relief was earlier accorded to restrain a nuisance than to prevent a trespass; perhaps because in the former case the injury is often of a public character, aggravated in its nature, and continuous in its harmful results. Lord Chancellor Eldon said, in Hanson v. Gardiner, 7 Ves. Jr. 306: "I remember when, in a case of trespass, unless it grew to a nuisance, an injunction would have been refused."

This ancient jurisdiction of courts of chancery to enjoin and abate nuisances is exercised upon grounds similar to those upon which relief is afforded in cases of trespass. In fact, a nuisance is but an aggravated and continuous trespass, although it may arise from an act permissible in itself, but which inflicts consequential injury upon another, while in trespass "the infringement of property rights is direct and the injury immediate." The underlying principle governing equitable relief in cases of nuisance is that the injury must be of such a nature that the party cannot have an adequate remedy at law. It is afforded where the injury would otherwise be irreparable, and to prevent a multiplicity of suits, or to suppress interminable and vexatious litigation. It is thus apparent that the jurisdiction of courts of equity over the subject of nuisances is not an original jurisdiction. It does not arise from the mere fact that a nuisance exists, but results from circumstances which call the jurisdiction into exercise upon other grounds.

The power was formerly exercised very sparingly and only in extreme cases,—at least until after the right and question of nuisance had been first settled at law. While in modern times the strictness of this rule has been somewhat relaxed, there is still a substantial agreement among the authorities that, to entitle a party to equitable relief before resorting to a court of law, his case must be clear, so as to be free from all substantial doubt as to his right to relief. In doubtful cases the party will be turned over to his legal remedy.

b. Obstruction of highways, streets, or alleys.

1. In general.

As to injunction by municipality against maintenance of building, fences, or other structures as a nuisance, see note to Drew v. Geneva, 42 L.R.A. 882.

The powers of a court of equity may be invoked to enjoin as a nuisance the maintenance of fences obstructing public streets or common ways.

In Hoole v. Atty. Gen. 22 Ala. 190, which was a bill filed by the attorney general to enjoin and abate an alleged public nuisance, consisting of a fence obstructing a public street or road, the court said: Any 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

obstruction of a public road or highway, which renders its passage less commodious, is a nuisance; and, whatever doubts may formerly have existed as to the powers of a court of chancery to enjoin and abate a public nuisance, the jurisdiction of that court for this purpose is at the present day well settled.

The erection of a wire fence in the middle of a street which has been dedicated and accepted as a street of a borough constitutes a purpresture, the maintenance of which equity will restrain. Lansdowne v. McEwen, 7 Del. Co. Rep. 311.

An obstruction of a street for the length of 85 feet and the width of 5 feet by a stone wall surrounded by an iron railing and inclosing an areaway to a basement is a purpresture which is a public nuisance per se, beyond the power of municipal authorities to license without express authority; and an injunction to prevent the continuance or creation of the nuisance may be granted at the suit of the proper officers. Smith v. McDowell, 148 Ill. 51, 22 L.R.A. 393, 35 N. E. 141.

The construction of a fence upon a public street is a public nuisance which might probably be restrained by a court of chancery. Langdale v. Bonton, 12 Ind. 467. The court adds: But, as the point is not made, we shall not elaborate it.

In Marengo v. Great Northern R. Co. 84 Minn. 397, 87 Am. St. Rep. 369, 87 N. W. 1117, it is intimated that a railroad company would have no right to obstruct, with fences, avenues crossing its tracks which have been platted, but not opened; and that, if it did, it might be restrained by injunction.

It is well settled that a fence erected across a street is a public nuisance, although constructed by one claiming title to the soil, and its maintenance will be enjoined by a court of chancery. Demopolis v. Webb, 87 Ala. 659, 6 So. 408.

An injunction is the proper remedy to compel the removal of a fence obstructing a common way or passage, so as to prevent the petitioner from having any ingress to or egress from the buildings on the passage, on which his property fronts; and the court has power to order the obstruction to be removed and the way opened before a hearing upon the merits. McDonogh v. Calloway, 7 Rob. (La.) 444. The court said: "It is notorious . . . that there are many small streets for public use, and alleys or passages common to the proprietors or occupants of many adjoining tenements, and that the use of such ways or passages is indispensable to the enjoyment of the houses and tenements; and can it, with any propriety, be said that a single person may, at pleasure, stop up such a street or alley, and prevent the people from getting in or out of their houses, and that a court has no power to order the obstructions to be removed or the way opened until a trial can be had at the end of a year or more, upon the merits of the case? The law has not left parties remediless in such cases, nor the courts powerless for the correction of such evils."

The unlawful nature of the threatened obstruction should be shown.

An injunction to restrain as a nuisance the threatened obstruction of a public highway by the erection of a fence therein should not be granted in the absence of an allegation that the proposed obstruction would be in violation of law. Ett v. Snyder, 5 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 523.

Therefore, a property owner will not be required to remove fences erected along the line of a highway existing by prescription or dedication, where it is not shown that the fence which was complained of as an encroachment was not wholly on the lands of the defendant and outside the boundaries of the highway. Existing or threatened obstruction of easements will be restrained with much favor where the fact of the existence of the obstruction or the right of the complainant is undoubted. Wakeman v. Wilbur, 21 N. Y. S. R. 556, 4 N. Y. Supp. 938.

A decree enjoining the fencing of a street cannot be upheld in the absence of any evidence tending to show that the defendants have obstructed, or threatened to obstruct, the street. McLemore v. McNeley, 56 Mo. App. 556.

The alleged obstruction of an alley by a fence will not be enjoined where the evidence as to the fact of obstruction is contradictory, because a court of equity does not grant injunctive relief except in a very plain case. Carlin v. Wolff, 154 Mo. 539, 51 S. W. 679, 55 S. W. 441.

One who has not been compensated for lands taken in laying out a road leading to a ferry is not entitled to obstruct the road with a fence, but should resort to legal means to have it vacated; and he may be enjoined from maintaining the obstruction. Draper v. Mackey, 35 Ark. 497.

But the aid of equity must be sought within a reasonable time. Delay for almost thirty years to complain of the obstruction of a street by fences will deprive an abutting owner of injunctive relief. The doors of equity are closed against a suitor where laches has been so long continued. Cox's Appeal, 11 W. N. C. 571, Affirming 10 W. N. C. 552.

Equitable intervention to relieve against the obstruction of a road or alley is often influenced by the prior conduct of the parties.

That one entitled to the use of an alley made no objection to the erection of a massive stone wall which obstructs it does not estop him from thereafter maintaining a suit in equity to compel the removal of the obstruction; since the doctrine of estoppel does not apply to an act of encroachment on land the title to which is equally well known, or equally open to the notice of both parties. Schaidt v. Blaul, 66 Md. 141, 6 Atl. 689.

One who has obstructed a road with a fence is not thereby estopped from maintaining an action to enjoin another person from obstructing the road by building fences across it, where the portion cut off by plaintiff had been permitted to fall into such a condition that it could not be used, and the traveled portion of the highway could be used. Here the elements necessary to constitute an estoppel were lacking. It was not shown that defendant in any manner altered his condition, or acquired any rights, by virtue of the obstructing of the road by plaintiff. Miller v. Schenck, 78 Iowa, 372, 43 N. W. 225.

Nor does the fact that the complainant had himself made a considerable encroachment on an alley estop him from maintaining a suit to enjoin its obstruction by another by the erection of a building and a massive stone wall. Schaidt v. Blaul, supra. The court said: The complainant is answerable for whatever injury he may have done under the defendant's rights of property, but we cannot hold that an encroachment made by him will forfeit his easement, or take away any of his means of redress for an interference with it.

But one maintaining a fence which obstructs a highway is not entitled to invoke the jurisdiction of a court of equity to restrain another person from obstructing the highway with a fence. Brutsche v. Bowers, 122 Iowa, 226, 97 N. W. 1076. The court said: He is also maintaining a fence on the north side of the highway, which he claims defendants are obstructing on the south side. This being true, he is in no position to complain. He comes into court with unclean hands, and is not entitled to invoke the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

The closing of a private alley will not be enjoined where the complainant forcibly destroyed a fence which the defendant had erected for the purpose of closing the alley while in peaceable possession of the premises, whether such possession was lawful or unlawful. Equity will not interfere to assist a party who has obtained possession by force. DeSale v. Millard, 108 Mich. 581, 66 N. W. 481.

An injunction is a proper remedy to prevent the closing of a highway against abutting owners who had no notice of the proceedings by the supervisors to vacate it. Moffitt v. Brainard, 92 Iowa, 122, 26 L.R.A. 521, 60 N. W. 226.

2. Special interest or damage.

The obstruction of a public highway by fences or gates is a public nuisance of which a private individual cannot complain, unless he has thereby sustained some private, direct, and material damage beyond that suffered by the public at large. A court of equity will not interfere to prevent a public nuisance, or to abate one already existing, at the instance of a private party unless he shows a special injury distinct from the public, actually sustained or justly apprehended. Private persons accustomed to use highways are interested, as well as the public, in the prevention and removal of obstructions. The remedy by injunction is perfect, and, while it protects one from the injury, all are alike benefited without the expense, delay, and multiplicity of actions incident to redress at common law; and, where the facts are easy of ascertainment, and the rights resulting therefrom free from difficulty, equity will grant relief at the suit of a citizen having an immediate interest therein.

To entitle a private individual to invoke the interposition of a court of equity to restrain a public nuisance arising from a threatened obstruction of a public highway by a fence, he must show special damages apprehended or sustained peculiar to himself and distinct from those suffered by the public at large. Ett v. Snyder, 5 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 523.

Equity will afford relief to one specially injured by the erection of gates and fences across a highway, by directing and requiring their removal and enjoining their continuance. Such obstructions are public nuisances, and will be abated and enjoined by courts of equity at the suit of a party aggrieved thereby. Hougham v. Harvey, 33 Iowa, 203.

A bill to enjoin the obstruction of a street by a fence may be maintained by an abutting property owner who is specially injured thereby. Where there is a special trust in favor of an adjoining property holder, or a special injury, a suit may be maintained by an individual in respect to a public street or highway. Earl v. Chicago, 136 Ill. 277, 26 N. E. 370.

So, an owner and occupant of lands adjoining a public highway, the free use of which is necessary to the enjoyment and use of the property, is entitled to injunctive relief to prevent an obstruction of the road by fences and gates, where the facts are easy of ascertainment and his rights resulting therefrom are free from difficulty. Green v. Oakes, 17 Ill. 249.

An owner of real estate abutting on a street or alley, who sustains a special injury not common to the public generally from the threatened obstruction of the street or alley by a building, may maintain an action to enjoin the threatened obstruction and to compel the removal of a fence placed across the street or alley; but he cannot avail himself of merely public rights. Mondle v. Toledo Plow Co. 6 Ohio N. P. 294.

So, a lot owner may enjoin one who maintains fences and hedges within the lines of streets, as dedicated by their common predecessors in title, in which the plaintiff has an easement and of the existence and width of which the defendant had constructive notice, where the plaintiff demanded the removal of the obstructions as soon as he learned they encroached on the streets, which was not until nine years after their erection; nor should relief be denied him because, as an act of neighborly courtesy, he aided in setting out another hedge on the same line. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And a bill will lie to enjoin the erection of a gate across an alley in which the plaintiff has a right of way, where his right is clear. Ensign v. Lyon, 1 Lack. Jur. 102, as cited in Pepper & Lewis's Digest, Injunction, col. 14, 206.

Where the remedy by injunction is sought for an injury to an individual, and not a public right, by reason of the inclosure of a public highway, it is necessary that the right to raise the obstruction should not be in controversy or should have been settled at law, otherwise an injunction is not the appropriate remedy. Until the rights of the parties are settled by a trial at law, a temporary injunction only is issued to prevent an irredeemable injury. Irwin v. Dixon, 9 How. 10, 13 L. ed. 25.

But an individual claiming under the public right is not entitled to enjoin the obstruction of a public highway by a fence, unless he has suffered some private, direct, and material damage beyond the public at large. Ibid.

One who will suffer no special injury distinct from that sustained by the public generally is not entitled to enjoin the fencing up of streets by public authority. Prince v. McCoy, 40 Iowa, 533.

One who has occasion to use a highway in common with the public generally is not entitled to maintain a suit to enjoin its obstruction by a fence, where the injury which he thereby sustains is not peculiar, and does not differ in any respect from that suffered by the public generally, except in degree only. Currier v. Davis, 68 N. H. 596, 41 Atl. 239.

Special or peculiar damages, differing not merely in degree, but in kind, from those which are deemed common to all, must be suffered in order to give a private party a right of action to enjoin as a public nuisance the obstruction of an alleged highway by a fence. Mahler v. Brumder, 92 Wis. 477, 31 L.R.A. 695, 66 N. W. 502.

A lot owner is not entitled to enjoin the maintenance of fences across the street, where the injury suffered by him does not differ in kind from that which the public have suffered. Cox's Appeal, 11 W. N. C. 571, Affirming 10 W. N. C. 552.

But an action to enjoin the obstruction of a highway by a fence may be maintained by one whose land abuts on the obstructed highway, although the obstruction injures others in like manner and degree so long as he suffers peculiar injury which does not embarrass the public in general. Martin v. Marks, 154 Ind. 549, 57 N. E. 249.

So, an abutting owner can enjoin the occupation of a street by a steam railroad company, and the erection of a fence or wall lengthwise therein, to the practical exclusion of the public from so much of the street as is so occupied, when no compensation to the owner has been ascertained or made, although the company is acting under the authority of a municipal ordinance. Equity will prevent the threatened appropriation of property without compensation until the right to make entry has been perfected by a full compliance with the Constitution and the laws. Pennsylvania Co. v. Bond, 99 Ill. App. 535.

The obstruction, by a fence, of a public road leading to a ferry, is a public nuisance and an injury to the owner of the ferry specially; and his right to an injunction against the continuance of such a nuisance is unquestionable. Draper v. Mackey, 35 Ark. 497.

But one who has occasion to pass over a highway more frequently than others does not sustain special damage peculiar to himself, beyond that of the general public, entitling him to injunctive relief, from the fact that fences which have been built in the highway caused the snow to drift into the road more than it would otherwise have done, delaying his passage over it and requiring him to shovel it out. Wakeman v. Wilbur, 21 N. Y. S. R. 556, 4 N. Y. Supp. 938.

So, the inconvenience resulting to a physician in visiting his patients, from the obstruction of a public road by fences, is not a special injury differing from that which every citizen suffers whose business or pleasure may call him to travel the road. It is of the same character, only perhaps different in degree from that which others suffer who have other business and live far away. This will not sustain his right of action to enjoin the obstruction. Wellborn v. Davies, 40 Ark. 83.

In an action to enjoin the fencing up of a street lying between complainant's property and a dock, an averment that the obstruction works great injury, and is a manifest violation of the obligations of the defendant, is insufficient, unless the facts stated in the bill show the truth of the averments. Use of the complainant's property and the wharf should be alleged, and that such use has been interfered with. White v. Flannigan, 1 Md. 525, 54 Am. Dec. 668.

An owner of land abutting upon a highway sustains such a peculiar injury from the closing up of the highway by a fence as entitles him to maintain an action to enjoin its obstruction, where he is thereby practically deprived of all access to his premises. Dyche v. Weichselbaum, 9 Kan. App. 360, 58 Pac. 126.

One having a right of way over the lands of another by prescription, which way is necessary to ingress to and egress from his land, has a private easement in the public highway, and may maintain an action to enjoin its obstruction by fences or gates. Harding v. Cowgar, 127 Ind. 245, 26 N. E. 799.

So, the owner of land abutting upon a highway which furnishes almost the only way available for entering and leaving his premises has such a special interest therein as entitles him to maintain an action to enjoin an obstruction of the road by a fence. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Miller v. Schenck, 78 Iowa, 372. 43 N. W. 225.

A person sustains a special injury, not suffered by the public, and may maintain a suit to enjoin the obstruction of a public highway, by the construction of wire fences across it, where it constitutes his only means of access to the premises in one direction. Hayden v. Stewart, 71 Kan. 11, 80 Pac. 43.

And an owner of land abutting on a street which he uses as a means of access to his property has a special interest in the street, which he may protect by a suit to enjoin as a nuisance its obstruction by a fence and gate. Smith v. Union Switch & Signal Co. 31 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 21.

A person owning real estate abutting upon a highway may maintain an action to enjoin the obstruction of the highway immediately in front of his real estate, even if the obstruction is not upon his property, if it materially impairs or interrupts his access thereto. Martin v. Marks, 154 Ind. 549, 57 N. E. 249.

While a county may abandon the road as a public road, and no longer work it, it cannot deprive the abutting owners of their right of ingress and egress afforded thereby. This is a private right which cannot be taken from them without compensation. They may maintain an action to enjoin the obstruction of the road by a fence, although their lands do not abut upon the road at the exact point where the obstruction occurs, when they are thereby deprived of their rightful ingress and egress. Hill v. Hoffman (Tenn. Ch. App.) 58 S. W. 929.

Although a person who suffers special damage from the erection and maintenance of a public nuisance consisting of a stone fence or wall, which obstructs his access to the highway, is entitled to injunctive relief if it appears that the injury is distinct from that suffered by the general public, yet relief will not be granted where the damage complained of is the obstruction of a passage way leading from the house to the street, where but a few rods distant there exists another way equally available and in daily use. Sargent v. George, 56 Vt. 627.

An abutting owner whose deed describes his property as fronting on a specified street has a property interest in the street entitling him to restrain by injunction its obstruction by a fence, provided he suffers some special and peculiar damage from the obstruction, not experienced in common with other citizens. But, where the street has never been laid off, and the fence is only 9 feet over on the street, and the complainant has no building on her lot, and it is not shown that the right of access is interfered with, there is not a sufficient showing of special damage. Perkins v. Ross (Tenn. Ch. App.) 42 S. W. 58.

So, a private person cannot maintain an action to enjoin the obstruction of a public road or street which is a cul-de-sac, by a fence between his property and the end of the road, merely because he purchased his premises with reference to a plat which indicated the existence of such a road. Special or peculiar damages differing not merely in degree, but in kind, from those common to all, are not shown. Mahler v. Brumder, 92 Wis. 477, 31 L.R.A. 695, 66 N. W. 502.

But an abutting property owner prevented from using an alley as a means of egress from and ingress to his premises by reason of its obstruction at both ends by fences thereby suffers special and peculiar injury, and is entitled to an injunction restraining the maintenance of the fences. Harniss v. Bulpitt, 1 Cal. App. 140, 81 Pac. 1022.

So, the owner of land abutting upon a street or alley, one end of which is obstructed by gates so that he cannot have egress from his property to other streets in that direction, suffers an injury peculiar to himself by reason of the public nuisance, and is entitled to an injunction compelling the removal of the gates, although they were erected by permission of the city council, which acted in excess of its authority. Kalteyer v. Sullivan, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 488, 46 S. W. 288.

One whose ingress to a public road leading to his market town is cut off by the erection of two wire fences across the road for the purpose of obstructing it, and who is the only member of the traveling public completely and exclusively cut off thereby, sustains special damage different from that suffered by the general public, and is entitled to maintain a bill to enjoin the maintenance of the obstruction. Cabbell v. Williams, 127 Ala. 320, 28 So. 405.

And one suffers an injury distinct from the public in consequence of the erection of fences across a public highway at a point between two separate tracts of lands which he owns, whereby the road leading to a mill operated by him is obstructed, and which compels him to go by a longer and worse road to the nearest market town, and hinders him in getting his stock to and from pasture, and in passing between his lands; and he is entitled to equitable relief by way of injunction. Ewell v. Greenwood, 26 Iowa, 377. The court remarked: Suppose every morning he should find a fence across a public highway leading to his mill, placed there by defendant with the malicious design of injuring him, Would anyone doubt his right to a remedy? Certainly not, and yet that would scarcely be a more patent, flagrant case than the one before us.

Private individuals whose lands abut upon a public road may resort to equity to restrain as a nuisance its obstruction by a wire fence, and by felling timbers across it, where they sustain peculiar injury in that the obstruction compels them to go 2 or 3 miles farther to reach the mill which they patronize and the city on which they depend. Hill v. Hoffman (Tenn. Ch. App.) 58 S. W. 929.

In Hougham v. Harvey, 33 Iowa, 204, the special injury sustained by the plaintiff, distinct from that suffered by the public, because of the obstruction of a highway, was that it was the only passable route, at times, from his home to the city and to his timber; and the court held, upon demurrer to the complaint, that the facts stated a case of injury distinct from the public, as a consequence of a public nuisance, and that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction.

But one accustomed to use a public highway leading to the schoolhouse of the district, and to the store at which he is accustomed to trade, is not entitled to an injunction restraining the obstruction of the road by fences, where it is not apparent that his farm adjoins such road, or that his only means of access to the school or store are over it. Luhrs v. Sturtevant, 10 Or. 170. In this case and the following one relief was denied because, in the opinion of the court, the facts stated and specifications of injury made did not show that the plaintiff had suffered any special or peculiar injury not common to the public at large.

A private person cannot enjoin the obstruction of a public highway by the building of a fence across it, without showing a special injury to himself not common to the public. It is not sufficient that the highway is his usual, convenient, and necessary route of travel from his house to his market town and usual place of business; that the injury to him is greater in degree than that to others does not entitle him to the relief sought. The court stated that, if the bill had been filed by someone whose lands bordered on the road, and facts had been averred showing an injury to the lands of the plaintiff by reason of the nuisance, then undoubtedly a remedy would have been afforded. McCowan v. Whitesides, 31 Ind. 235.

The owner of property the vendibility and value of which will be impaired by the fencing up of streets suffers such injury as will entitle him to injunctive relief. Prince v. McCoy, 40 Iowa, 533.

The erection of a fence in the public highway in front of plaintiff's real estate, whereby the annual rental value of the property as well as its market value is impaired, inflicts a peculiar and particular injury upon him different in kind from that which is suffered by the community in general, and entitles him to injunctive relief. Martin v. Marks, 154 Ind. 549, 57 N. E. 249.

In an action to restrain the obstruction, by a fence, of an alleged public road, special injury entitling plaintiff to maintain his suit for an injunction is shown by evidence that the closing of the road would injure the salable value of the plaintiff's farm at least $10 per acre, or about $1,400 in all, and that it would prevent the securing of as desirable tenants for the property as could otherwise be obtained. Evans v. Scott (Tex. Civ. App.) 97 S. W. 116.

But diminution of the market value of his property does not entitle a landowner to enjoin the obstruction, by fences, of roads convenient to him, but which have been actually vacated by the county court, or abandoned owing to a change in the population, business, and necessities of the community at large. Wellborn v. Davies, 40 Ark. 83.

Nor should injunctive relief be granted to prevent the obstruction of a street by buildings and inclosures, although the complainants alleged that the obstructions caused special, peculiar, and irreparable injury to them by impairing the value and enjoyment of their property, where no facts are averred to show that the allegation is well founded, and, according to the proof, the damage to complainant's property is trivial, and such as might be readily ascertained and compensated in an action at law. Fort v. Groves, 29 Md. 193.

In Van Wagenen v. Cooney, 45 N. J. Eq. 24, 16 Atl. 689, injunctive relief was denied one who complained that the owner of property on the opposite side of a cul-de-sac, which was a public highway, had extended his fence line so as to include about 4 feet of the public highway, and otherwise obstructed it with a stable and with carts and wagons, on the ground that the complainant did not suffer serious special damage, and that he could obtain full and ample redress at law, where the complainant's lots are unimproved, and it does not appear but that he may have access to them by some other way than through the cul-de-sac, or that there is any present necessity for reaching the lots.

The fencing up by public authorities of streets which have not been and cannot be used for the purpose of their dedication cannot be enjoined by a property owner who will not be injured in the free use and enjoyment of his property by their inclosure,—especially where it is proposed to keep them inclosed only to such time as they may be put in condition for use. Prince v. McCoy, 40 Iowa, 533. If we regard the proposed inclosure of the streets as in conflict with the abstract right of the plaintiff and the public, yet equity, recognizing that no loss, no damage, to plaintiff can be sustained by the act, will refuse the relief. The act cannot be called a nuisance, for it works an injury to no one. It cannot, indeed, be considered an obstruction to a public highway, for the highway has only an ideal existence. In short, it is an act that injures no one, and no mischief, public or private, is wrought thereby. In such a case chancery will not interfere.

The threatened obstruction of an alleged street or highway by the erection of a fence and building therein will not be restrained by injunction, unless the existence of the right to the use of the highway as such is admitted, or the right is clear or easy of ascertainment, and free from all reasonable doubt, and the obstruction of it seriously affects the value and substance of the individual's estate. Walt v. Foster, 12 Or. 247, 7 Pac. 24.

But when the right of the public to the use of a highway is clear, and the obstruction of it seriously affects the value and substance of an individual's estate, or, in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

short, he suffers an injury distinct from the public as a consequence of such obstruction, there is no doubt but that equity will afford relief and abate the nuisance. Luhrs v. Sturtevant, 10 Or. 170.

Persons who have cared for a burial ground and kept it in repair, and whose deceased relatives have been buried therein, sustain a special and peculiar injury where the street leading to the cemetery is obstructed with gates and fences, and they may maintain an action to enjoin the obstruction. Nelson v. Randolph, 222 Ill. 531, 78 N. E. 914.

And one who purchases land abutting on a public road which has for seventy-five years been open and in use, and so remains for many years thereafter, has the right, as a member of the public and an adjoining landowner, to maintain a suit to prevent the obstruction of the road by a wire fence, where it was in general use as the main thoroughfare between two neighborhoods and led to an old established graveyard. Burkitt v. Battle (Tenn. Ch. App.) 59 S. W. 429.

But the fencing up of a highway which has been replaced by another road will not be enjoined on the ground that it affords access to a public cemetery in which members of the families of the plaintiffs are buried. This does not constitute such a personal or peculiar injury as entitles them to maintain the suit. Sunderland v. Martin, 113 Ind. 411, 15 N. E. 689. The court said: They have not sustained injury that is special or peculiar to them, or different in kind from that sustained by the rest of the community. It is not a case where the obstruction deprives parties of necessary access to or egress from property.

A town has such an interest in a public highway as will entitle it to maintain an action in equity to prevent its obstruction by felling trees and building fences. Neshkoro v. Nest, 85 Wis. 126, 55 N. W. 176.

The liability of a town to pay damages in case a person is injured by reason of the erection of a fence across a public highway is a sufficient interest to enable it to appear as plaintiff in a complaint in equity to prevent the threatened obstruction. Burlington v. Schwarzman, 52 Conn. 181, 52 Am. Rep. 571.

Equity will not refuse relief where the injury would be irreparable.

One entitled to the use of an alley in the conduct of his business may enjoin its obstruction by the erection of a building and a massive stone wall, since the obstruction destroys his estate in the character in which it is enjoyed. Schaidt v. Blaul, 66 Md. 141, 6 Atl. 669.

In an action to enjoin the closing of an alley, which the complainant alleges that the defendant threatens to close up by a gate or other structure, and that, if he does so, it will result greatly to his injury; and the defendant alleges that at the time of selling the land to plaintiff there was simply an enclosed strip of land which was sold without regard to the alley. the complainant being expressly notified that the strip was defendant's private property. — the granting of an injunction until the facts can be passed upon by a jury is not an abuse of discretion. Hughes v. McIntosh, 83 Ga. 431, 9 S. E. 1110.

One entitled by grant to the use of an alleyway, and who is not estopped from asserting his right, and has not lost it by non-user, may maintain an action to prevent the maintenance, across the entrance of the alley, of a gate which is kept locked with the intent thereby to exclude him from the enjoyment of the easement. The plaintiff was held not deprived of his right to invoke equitable interference by opening the gate himself as long as his title to the enjoyment of this part of the alleyway was disputed and resisted by the defendant, who, in his testimony, stated that he would exclude from the use of the alley all persons not acting under his authority or license. Welsh v. Taylor, 50 Hun, 137, 2 N. Y. Supp. 815.

3. Injury must be irreparable.

Where a right to a public highway is alleged to be violated by the erection of a fence, and a remedy is sought through an injunction, it will not be issued at the instance of either a public officer or a private individual, unless there is danger of great, continued, and irreparable injury. Irwin v. Dixon, 9 How. 10, 13 L. ed. 25. The court said: This form of remedy was one much questioned, as permissible either to the public or an individual. in the case of a public right of this kind involved. And when at last deemed allowable it was only where the community at large, or some individual, felt interested in having the supposed nuisance immediately prostrated on account of its great, continued, and irreparable injury; and it was then used as a sort of preventive remedy to a multiplicity of suits, and in cases where an action at law would yield too tardy and imperfect redress. When, however, delay can safely be tolerated, the usual remedy in such cases, by or in behalf of the public, is an indictment rather than an injunction.

In Burlington v. Schwarzman, 52 Conn. 181, 52 Am. Rep. 571, it is remarked: Were the way merely a private one thus wrongfully fenced in and threatened, we think our courts would not hesitate to enforce the remedy on the ground of preventing a recurring grievance and multiplicity of suits. But its being a public way and the act a public nuisance make the case, in our judgment, vastly stronger; many people are exposed to great annoyance and injury, and may have occasion to bring many suits. Moreover, the act complained of is one that denies the existence and defeats all the purposes of a public highway. Consequently the injury to the highway as such may well be termed irreparable. All remedies other than by injunction would be tardy, uncertain.

A sale of property described in the conveyance as bounded by a designated street implies necessarily a covenant that the purchaser shall have the use of the street, and, in case of its obstruction by fences, he is entitled to injunctive relief on the ground that the trespass works irreparable mischief which destroys the substance and value of his estate in the character in which it is enjoyed. White v. Flannigan, 1 Md. 525, 54 Am. Dec. 668.

But a property owner whose access to a turnpike is obstructed by the maintenance of a fence in front of his land is not entitled to enjoin its maintenance, although it might be removed without endangering the lives, limbs, or property of travelers upon the turnpike, where it does not appear that the injury complained of is irreparable, or that the remedy at law is inadequate. Frankford & B. Turnp. Co.'s Appeal, 11 W. N. C. 184.

So, one whose carriage way running diagonally from his premises to the highway intersects the traveled portion of the road opposite the land of another abutting landowner and upon the same side of the highway is not entitled to enjoin its obstruction by the erection of a stone wall or fence by the adjacent proprietor and within the limits of the highway, but in such a manner as not to interfere with any travel except along the carriage way, where the one maintaining the carriage way has another, although less convenient, means of egress from his premises to the highway. Injunctive relief should be granted only in case of necessity, where other remedies may be inadequate, and to redress substantial and serious, rather than technical or fanciful, injuries. Sargent v. George, 56 Vt. 627.

The maintenance of a fence across a highway will not be enjoined where it is not shown that the plaintiffs or the public suffer irreparable damage by reason of the existence of the fence in the highway, or that there is such danger of mischief on that account as to bring the case within any rule of equity jurisdiction before the establishment of the plaintiffs' right in a suit at law. It not appearing that the remedy at law is inadequate, equitable relief must be denied. Newcastle v. Haywood, 67 N. H. 178, 37 Atl. 1040.

The fact that the fence obstructing a highway is of a temporary character which might be easily removed by a traveler is not a sufficient ground for refusing injunctive relief. Burlington v. Schwarzman, supra.

But the erection across an alleged highway of a wall of stone and timber temporary in character and easily removed, and not likely to produce irreparable injury, will not be enjoined where the alleged road was never opened throughout its entire length, and at the place in question was opened many years after the view by private persons, and the road has been disputed many years. Bunnell's Appeal, 69 Pa. 59. In the preceding case the obstruction of the public highway, although by a fence easily removable, was considered an irreparable injury to the highway, as such, while in this case the injunction was temporarily refused until after a trial at law of the disputed facts.

An injunction to restrain the building of a fence across a road will not be granted where the nuisance will not cause an irreparable injury to an individual, such as no damage would compensate; and certainly not until the right has been determined at law. Lining v. Geddes, 1 McCord, Eq. 304, 16 Am. Dec. 606.

A city whose right to the user and control of streets is clear may maintain a bill to restrain the inclosure of the streets by private individuals, where the element of irreparable mischief appears and damages at law will be inadequate to redress the injury, and the nuisance is of a continuing nature and presents something of the feature of perpetual injury. If the right of the city is not clear it may be required first to test and settle its right at law. Briel v. Natchez, 48 Miss. 423.

In Montana Twp. v. Ruark, 39 Kan. 109, 18 Pac. 61, it was held that a township trustee could not maintain an action in the name of the township to enjoin a road overseer from obstructing the highway or from preventing the removal of the obstructions, where the apparent object of the litigation is to determine the legality of the road; since, for the settlement of that question, there is a plain and adequate remedy at law.

But the right of a purchaser of land to have a street kept open as against his grantor may be determined in a suit for an injunction to remove a fence and wall placed therein by the latter, and their removal decreed. White v. Tide Water Oil Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 1, 25 Atl. 199. The court observes: If the way be permanently obstructed by the fence and wall in question, the complainant will be without adequate remedy at law. He may repeatedly, by successive suits, recover damages, because of the continuance of the nuisance; but such recoveries will not necessarily suffice to secure him the enjoyment of his right. Incidentally to the award of that relief, the complainant's legal right must, and properly will, be determined and declared in this court.

The mere fact that there is a remedy at law by indictment or action will not, alone, preclude the exercise of the power of chancery to prevent the obstruction of highways; but it is a reason why the jurisdiction should be confined to cases of a very plain character, while the injury is irreparable and cannot await the slow progress of a legal redress. Bunnell's Appeal, supra.

That one who obstructs a public road by the erection of fences across it may be prosecuted criminally and the nuisance abated does not afford an adequate remedy at law precluding injunctive relief, since a 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

repetition of the injury could not be prevented in such a proceeding. Cabbell v. Williams, 127 Ala. 320, 28 So. 405.

And a similar ruling was made with reference to indictment and punishment, or a penalty or forfeiture which may be recovered in a civil action, in Martin v. Marks, 154 Ind. 549, 57 N. E. 249.

So in Burlington v. Schwarzman, 52 Conn. 181, 52 Am. Rep. 571.

But where a remedy is provided by statute equity will not interfere.

A suit in equity cannot be maintained by commissioners of highways to compel a property owner to remove so much of a fence as she has replaced, to its former position, and which it is claimed obstructs a highway, or from replacing the rest of the fence, since the statute prescribes the method of procedure on their part in case of encroachment. Rozell v. Andrews, 103 N. Y. 150, 8 N. E. 513.

Nor is one accustomed to use a road entitled to maintain a suit to enjoin the maintenance of a fence which it is alleged causes the snow in winter time to drift into the road more than it otherwise would, but he should avail himself of the statutory remedy, which provides a simple, speedy, and inexpensive mode of proceeding to remove obstructions on public highways. Wakeman v. Wilbur, 21 N. Y. S. R. 556, 4 N. Y. Supp. 939.

A bill in equity to remove a fence as an encroachment on a highway will not lie in the absence of special circumstances, as an adequate legal remedy is provided by How. Stat. (Mich.) §§ 1371, 1378, authorizing encroachments to be removed by the town commissioner of highways. This remedy, the court said, was devised for the very purpose; made obligatory in terms and better adapted to do justice. Lebanon Twp. v. Burch, 78 Mich. 641, 44 N. W. 148.

In an earlier case, one who had for over twenty years used a road which had been recognized as such by the landowners through whose property it ran was held entitled to maintain a bill to prevent its obstruction with fences whether it be a public or a private way. Nye v. Clark, 55 Mich. 599, 22 N. W. 57. The court said: No action of damages could give adequate redress to a party who is hemmed in so as to have no peaceable egress from his own farm. The suggestion that he may relieve himself by taking down the fences whenever he wishes to go through does not commend itself to our judgment as likely to secure convenience, or to subserve the public peace.

A bill in equity does not lie in Maine to obtain the removal of fences from a public way or a private way. The statutes of the state provide a full, plain, adequate, and complete remedy for such a wrong by an action at law. Such obstructions are a nuisance, and any person injured thereby in his comfort, property, or the enjoyment of his estate may not only maintain an action against the offender to recover his damages, but he may, in the same action, obtain a warrant for the abatement or removal of the nuisance, unless the defendant will undertake and enter into a recognizance with surety, to abate or remove it himself. Davis v. Weymouth, 80 Me. 307, 14 Atl. 199.

But the fact that a town council have been invested by the legislature with power to abate nuisances within the limits of a corporation does not, without an express provision to that effect, deprive chancery of its jurisdiction to enjoin a public nuisance consisting of a fence obstructing a public street or road. Hoole v. Atty. Gen. 22 Ala. 190.

Right to relief does not depend upon the pecuniary responsibility of those creating the obstruction.

An action in equity to enjoin the obstruction of a street by a fence is an appropriate remedy, although there is no averment of the insolvency of the defendants. Ellison v. Louisville, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 593, 31 S. W. 723.

The mere fact that it is difficult to determine the damages sustained by lot owners from an intrusion upon the streets is one of the reasons for exercising equitable jurisdiction.

It is no defense to a suit by a property owner to enjoin another from maintaining hedges and fences which encroach upon a public street dedicated by their common predecessors in title, and in which the plaintiff had an easement, that the streets were left of sufficient width to meet the present requirements of public travel in that vicinity, and that property had not been depreciated in value because of the obstruction. Wickham v. Twaddell, 25 Pa. Super. Ct. 188.

4. Benefit; balance of inconveniences.

An obstruction of an alleged highway by fences will not be restrained by injunction where the easement, if there is one, is of no practical value to the public or to the complainant, owing to the nature of the ground over which the road runs and the impracticability of making it passable without the expenditure of money largely in excess of any benefit that could be derived from the use of the easement. Equity will not do that which will be of no benefit to the party asking it and only a hardship upon the party coerced; or, as the maxim contained in the old books is, the law does not require anyone to do vain and useless things. Seeger v. Mueller, 133 Ill. 86, 24 N. E. 513, Affirming 28 Ill. App. 28.

Equity will not enjoin the fencing up of an alleged highway, where its interference would inflict only injury or damage on the defendant without securing any substantial right or benefit to the plaintiff. Mahler v. Brumder, 92 Wis. 477, 31 L.R.A. 695, 66 N. W. 502.

The purchaser of a lot who receives a deed referring to a plat which shows that the premises front on a designated avenue is entitled to enjoin an obstruction of the avenue by a fence or gate; but he is not entitled to a decree ordering the removal of fences across other avenues delineated on the plat, where it does not appear that he has occasion, or is ever likely to have occasion, to use them, while it would oblige those erecting them to incur a great deal of additional trouble and expense. In such circumstances the plaintiff should be left to his remedy at law. Chapin v. Brown, 15 R. I. 579, 10 Atl. 639.

A purchaser of land along a portion of the front of which a fence obstructing access to a turnpike has been maintained for over sixty years by a turnpike company is not entitled to enjoin its maintenance as a nuisance where the injury complained of may be compensated in damages, and the balance of inconveniences would preponderate in favor of the defendant. Frankford & B. Turnp. Co.'s Appeal, 11 W. N. C. 184.

c. Obstruction of private roads or ways.

1. In general.

Injunction is a proper remedy to prevent the maintenance of a gate which wrongfully obstructs a private way. Flaherty v. Fleming (W. Va.) 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 461, 52 S. E. 857.

And injunction is a proper remedy to prevent the obstruction of a passway by fences or gates.

The maintenance of a rail fence in a straight line along a passway which is of the stipulated width of 16 feet, and the course of which is so crooked that the fence is less than 8 feet from the center of the passway in places, will be enjoined although the available width of the way is 16 feet, since the owner of the easement is entitled to use the old traveled way. Calvert v. Weddle, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1883, 44 S. W. 648.

One who attempts to close, by a fence, a lane which for many years has been maintained along the line between his lands and those of an adjoining owner, and in so doing extends the fencing for from 10 to 20 feet on the land of the latter, will be enjoined from so doing. Grant v. Crow, 47 Iowa, 632. The court said: We know of no statutory authority giving the defendant a right to erect and maintain a fence on the plaintiff's land, and certainly none such existed at common law. The erection of such fence is a trespass, which may be enjoined.

So, injunctive relief to prevent the obstruction of a private way by a fence is warranted, where the structure is erected upon ground formerly occupied by a stone wall the center of which formed the northerly boundary of the land of the defendant, who placed the posts of the new fence north of the center line of the old wall. Dewire v. Hanley (Conn.) 65 Atl. 573.

A bill to restrain defendant from maintaining a fence across a private way leading from the plaintiff's land, which had been conveyed to him by the defendant, to a highway, shows a continuing interference with the plaintiff's right of passage, and presents a case for equitable relief. An action at law would not prove as practical and efficient a remedy, and is therefore not adequate. Driscoll v. Smith, 184 Mass. 221, 68 N. E. 210.

And, under a statute specifically prohibiting the erection of a barbed-wire fence along the line of a right of way without the consent of both parties to the fence, the court may properly enjoin the maintenance of such a structure along the line of the easement. In this case the defendant admitted the erection of the fence, but denied that it was a nuisance or interfered with plaintiff's right of way. McKinney v. Thompson, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 733, 86 S. W. 543.

But equity will not enjoin the maintenance of fences or gates across a right of way, unless they constitute an unreasonable burden precluding its fair enjoyment. *

The owner of pasture land will not be required to remove gates erected by him across the right of way, where they are necessary for his enjoyment of the land over which the way passes, and do not constitute an unreasonable interference with the right of way. Watson v. Hoke, 73 S. C. 361, 53 S. E. 537. The court said: The owner of the servient estate in farm lands does not lose the right to inclose his land for agricultural purposes by reason of taking it subject to a private right of way; nor is it his duty to run fences on both sides for the entire length of the way as laid out. He may inclose his lands, using gates, provided they are necessary for the enjoyment of his property and are not so numerous or of such a size and construction as to constitute an unreasonable burden on the right of way.

One entitled to a right of way to his wood lots over the land of another cannot enjoin the maintenance across it of fences built with stakes, with rails to slip between them like bars, or of a "slip gate" so constructed that the rails can be taken out and turned around, affording passage. He cannot require that the way be left open, or that swinging gates be left in the fence. The court observed: The easement granted is a right of passage without defining the manner of its enjoyment with or without bars or gates over the agricultural lands of the defendant. Nothing passes as an incident to such a grant, but what is requisite to its fair enjoyment. That must be the reasonable and usual enjoyment and user of such a privilege. Bakeman v. Talbot, 31 N. Y. 366, 88 Am. Dec. 275.

Likewise, the grantee of a right of way may be enjoined from obstructing it to prevent the grantor or his assigns from passing over it, where such right is not inconsistent with the right of passage granted. The court intimated, however, that, if the grantor undertook to exercise this right in such a manner as substantially to impair or abridge the right of way of the grantee, or to annoy her in the use of her right of way, she would be entitled to the same remedy against him which he now invokes against her. Campbell v. Kuhlmann, 39 Mo. App. 632.

One who has enjoyed continuously, uninterruptedly, and adversely a right of way in another's lands for more than thirty years has a right of way by prescription, to prevent the obstruction of which an injunction is the proper remedy. Sheeks v. Erwin, 130 Ind. 31, 29 N. E. 11.

And one who has acquired a right of way by prescription is entitled to enjoin its obstruction by a gate which hinders his lawful use and enjoyment of the easement. A right of way thus acquired is commensurate with and measured by the use, and within such limits the owner of the land has no right to obstruct it. Shivers v. Shivers, 32 N. J. Eq. 578, Affirmed in 35 N. J. Eq. 562.

But an injunction to restrain one through whose farm a road existed, from building fences across it with gates which he kept locked, is properly refused where it is not shown that the complainants had a legal right to use the road as a private way, either by prescription or otherwise, or that the road has ever been established by the proper authority as a public road, or that it had ever been worked or recognized by the public authorities of the county as a public road, so as to give the complainants a prescriptive right to use it. Clements v. Logan, 44 Ga. 30.

And an injunction to compel the removal of a fence obstructing a road running through the farm of the defendant, and to the use of which the complainant, who owns the adjacent farm, claims a prescriptive right, should not be granted, where the right is disputed and is not determined at law, and the plaintiff has another reasonable outlet from his farm to a public highway with the apparent right to the use of the same. Gulick v. Fisher, 92 Md. 353, 49 Atl. 375.

So, the obstruction of a road will not be enjoined where it was never dedicated nor accepted as a highway, and has for years been barred by gates or other obstructions, to be opened and closed by parties passing over the land, and when the plaintiff has a good road leading through his own lands to the county road, but which causes him 2 miles additional travel to market. Quinn v. Anderson, 70 Cal. 454, 11 Pac. 746.

The court has jurisdiction to decree injunctive relief where an equity based on indisputable rights is asserted.

The purchaser at private or judicial sale of property on which a continuous and apparent easement or servitude has been imposed by a former owner for the benefit of other lands, in the absence of an express reservation or agreement, takes the property subject to the easement or servitude, and will be enjoined from obstructing it by fences, where the rights of the party claiming the easement are admitted in the pleadings. Hunter v. Wilcox, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. 191.

But an injunction to compel the removal of fences erected across a private way will not be decreed where the right of way claimed is doubtful. This would be sufficient reason for refusing relief until the right is established at law. King v. McCully, 38 Pa. 76.

One who has obstructed a road for the purpose of diverting public travel to his own ferry, and causing it to pass around the ferry and toll gate of another, is not entitled to enjoin such other person from obstructing, with a fence, a public road from which he had constructed a way leading to his ferry, where such way had not been established by law, and the result of the obstruction was to straighten and improve it. Hill v. Averett, 27 Ala. 484. The court remarked: We will not say there is no case where the chancellor can remove an impediment or obstruction in a private way which is not established by law. We confine our opinion to the case before us as disclosed by the record.

It is a well-settled rule of equity that, where an easement or servitude is annexed to a private estate, the due enjoyment of it will be protected by injunction against encroachment or invasion.

A purchaser of an inner lot with a dwelling house thereon is entitled to a right of way by necessity over a road theretofore established by his grantor, and which constitutes the only means of communication by carriage from the dwelling to the public thoroughfares of the city; and his enjoyment of the easement will be protected by injunction until the hearing of the case, where the defendant has obstructed the way with a fence. Wheeler v. Gilsey, 35 How. Pr. 139.

Injunction preventing the permanent obstruction of, or interference with, a way established by contract, is a proper mode of enforcing the agreement.

Where proprietors of adjacent lands, by mutual agreement, definitely establish the boundaries of a private way previously laid out along their lines, and appropriate the strip of land embraced therein to be used as a perpetual easement for the benefit of the abutting lands of each and the common benefit of all, and, in pursuance of the agreement, fence to the boundaries so agreed upon, and thereafter improve and use the way thus established, the agreement may be enforced in equity, at the suit of a purchaser from one of such proprietors, against a purchaser with notice from another. Shields v. Titus, 46 Ohio St. 544, 22 N. E. 717.

A railroad company which has obstructed, with fences placed on either side of its tracks, a footway which crosses the railroad on the level, will be enjoined from maintaining the obstruction at the suit of one entitled to a private right of way at that point by contract, where it proceeds under an act of parliament declaring the footway to be extinguished, but providing no compensation therefor; since the legislature evidently intended to deal with the road only as a public footway. Wells v. London T. & S. R. Co. L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 126, 37 L. T. N. S. 302.

2. Adequacy of remedy at law.

Injunction will lie to prevent the obstruction of a private way by a fence, on the ground that the party has no adequate remedy at law. Newell v. Sass, 142 Ill. 104, 31 N. E. 176; Dewire v. Hanley (Conn.) 65 Atl. 573.

An injunction lies in favor of one entitled to the free and uninterrupted use as a way of a strip of land sought to be dedicated as such by his grantor, and which has become an appurtenant of the plaintiff's premises, to restrain a successor in interest of such grantor from permanently closing the same with fences and other obstructions. An action for damages for obstructing the way and thus impairing its usefulness as appurtenant of the plaintiff's premises would not supply an adequate remedy, since all that he could recover in an action at law would be the damages sustained up to the time of the commencement of the action, and the right of way would still remain obstructed. Haight v. Littlefield, 71 Hun, 285, 54 N. Y. S. R. 733, 24 N. Y. Supp. 1097.

So, one having the right to the use of a passageway 8 feet wide throughout its entire length is entitled to injunctive relief against one who has obstructed the passageway by making excavations therein and placing stone steps leading to his land, and has erected barriers near these openings, which structures are of a permanent and continuous character. An action at law would not give the plaintiff an equally adequate and complete remedy. Nash v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. 127 Mass. 91.

In Cook v. Ferbert, 145 Mo. 462, 46 S. W. 947, a licensee for an indefinite time of the right to use a strip as a passageway, and who, in consideration of the privilege, erected a fence along the way, was refused relief by injunction to prevent the licensor from obstructing the way with a fence and gate which he kept locked. But the court intimated that, if the fee to the land used as a roadway had been purchased, any interference with its use by fencing or putting a gate across it would have been an injury without adequate remedy at law, and for which injunction would be a proper remedy.

One whose free use of a private road through gates which he has constructed is wrongfully obstructed by posts and wires is entitled to injunctive relief under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 3649, providing that the remedy of injunction shall exist in all cases where an irreparable injury to real property is threatened, and to prevent the doing of any legal wrong whatever, whenever an adequate remedy cannot be afforded by an action for damages. Downing v. Corcoran, 112 Mo. App. 645, 87 S. W. 114.

But in Washington it has been held that the obstruction of a way used by one landowner to reach certain portions of his farm, by an adjoining landowner who had removed the division fence between them, over onto the former's land, and withheld possession of so much thereof as was thus inclosed, will not be restrained, since there is a remedy at law, under Wash. Terr. Code, chap. 46, for the recovery of interest in real property. Meeker v. Gilbert, 3 Wash. Terr. 369, 19 Pac. 18.

An injunction will lie to prevent the obstruction of a private way with gates on the ground that there is no adequate remedy at law, where the case of the complainant is clearly established by the evidence. Smith v. Young, 160 Ill. 163, 43 N. E. 486.

An action will lie by the owner of the right of way across another's land to compel the reopening and refencing of the right of way and the removal of obstructions therefrom, by which it was entirely inclosed without the establishment of the easement in an action at law, if its existence is clearly shown. An action for damages is not an adequate remedy. Mänbeck v. Jones, 190 Pa. 171, 42 Atl. 536.

But an injunction restraining a grantor, who contends that the cleared portion of a lot was included in the deed by mistake, from obstructing complainant's right of way by fences, and from refusing to allow a right of way over it, to and from a slate quarry on part of the tract, will not be granted at the suit of one claiming under the grantee, until the dispute as to the title to the land is settled by a jury. Georgia Slate Co. v. Davitte, 79 Ga. 627, 4 S. E. 873.

One entitled to use a road or way across the premises of another, and which the latter has obstructed, is entitled to equitable relief on the grounds that an estimation of the damages sustained would be difficult, that a denial of the right would be productive of many actions, and because the obstruction is a continuing injury. Longendyck v. Anderson, 59 How. Pr. 1.

So, one entitled under a covenant in a deed to the use of a private road leading from his premises to a public highway may enjoin encroachment upon it by fences and other structures, since his remedy would not be complete at law without a multiplicity of actions. Gawtry v. Leland, 40 N. J. Eq. 323.

And an action may be brought in equity to maintain a right of way against the encroachments of several persons having distinct interests, who have obstructed it by fences, where the establishment of plaintiff's right at law would require separate suits against the different adjoining owners with a verdict in his favor in all the suits, and a substantial agreement upon the lines of location. Stockwell v. Fitzgerald, 70 Vt. 468, 41 Atl. 504.

Injunction is an appropriate remedy to restrain the locking of a gate at the end of an alley which plaintiff has the right to use as an outlet from his premises to the street. Downing v. Dinwiddie, 132 Mo. 92, 33 S. W. 470, Rehearing denied in 132 Mo. 101, 33 S. W. 575. The court said: The right to use a passageway affording the only exit to the public highway from out-buildings of a town lot is a species of property the interference with which is very difficult, if not impossible, adequately to compensate or measure by pecuniary damages. The continued exercise of the right to use a passageway is an important and valuable convenience incident to the ownership of property used for residence purposes.

One whose private right of way acquired by prescription and furnishing the only means of egress from his home to the highway and to the mill, market, and church, is obstructed by the erection of gates which are kept locked, is entitled to an injunction restraining the obstruction of the way and requiring the gates to be unlocked. This is the only plain, adequate, and complete remedy. Boyd v. Woolwine, 40 W. Va. 282, 21 S. E. 1020.

An injunction is the proper remedy to prevent the locking and chaining of a gate constructed across a right of way of necessity. Jay v. Michael, 92 Md. 198, 48 Atl. 61. This decision follows the succeeding case of Shipley v. Caples, 17 Md. 179, and may be distinguished from Amelung v. Seekamp, 9 Gill & J. 468, infra, on the ground that there the bill did not aver that the way obstructed was the only way of the plaintiff, while in this case it is charged that the way obstructed is the only means of access, and that the plaintiff's property will be permanently injured and its value destroyed.

One entitled to use a road over the land of another, and which he and those under whom he claims have been accustomed to use from time immemorial, is entitled, on the ground of irreparable injury, to an injunction restraining the fencing up of the road, which is his only outlet to his market town, except by a circuitous and inconvenient route over the lands and by the permission of persons who might at any time withhold such permission. Shipley v. Caples, supra. The court said: If the party were put to a different form of action, it is difficult to perceive a clear rule for the measure of damages. It is said that the cost of procuring a private road under the law would furnish a standard, but, conceding that principle, if the complainant has a right to the present road it would be unjust to place him in a predicament where he might be obliged to take such other as the commissioners, in their discretion, might think proper to locate for his use. That would not allow him compensation for the injury, but change his rights altogether. If he is entitled to the use of this road, the law will not allow another person so to act as to deprive him of it, and compel him to resort to another.

But an injunction should not issue to restrain the obstruction and inclosure of a private road leading to the mills of the plaintiff, although it is averred that great and irreparable damage will accrue to him, where it is not charged that he has no other reasonably convenient outlet from his mills, or that the obstruction will drive away a valuable portion of his customers, and no facts are stated to show that his apprehension of damage is well founded,—especially where he has stood by and permitted the defendant to inclose the land affected by the way in question, and to cultivate and improve it for four years. Amelung v. Seekamp, supra. Said the court: The bill, so far from exhibiting a case where the continuance of the outrage complained of would work great and irremediable damage, shows one which warrants the inference that the loss or injury resulting would be trivial, and susceptible of adequate compensation in damages at law.

It has been held in Kentucky that, while a court of equity can interpose in behalf of a person whose right to the use of a pass-way already in existence has been obstructed, it has no jurisdiction in a case where the establishment of a pass-way is claimed on the mere ground of necessity. The reason for the ruling is that it is the province of a court of law to establish such a pass-way. Hall v. McLeod, 2 Met. (Ky.) 98, 74 Am. Dec. 400.

Equity jurisdiction extends to giving relief against interference by the owner of land with a private right of way over it, constituting the sole means of access to other land. An action for damages could not give adequate redress to one who is so hemmed in as to have no peaceable egress from his own premises. Lathrop v. Elsner, 93 Mich. 599, 53 N. W. 791.

So, the grantee of a right of way by an instrument not recorded is entitled to enjoin a subsequent purchaser of the premises crossed by the right of way, and who had at least constructive notice of his claim, from maintaining a fence across the roadway whereby the owner of the right of way was deprived of access to a river which was very important to his farm as he had no living water on his land. In such a case there is no adequate remedy at law. McCann v. Day, 57 Ill. 101.

And it is sufficient to entitle a party to relief against the obstruction of a private way that its use is highly convenient and beneficial to him.

An injunction will be granted on the ground that there is no adequate remedy at law to prevent the obstruction of a private alley with gates, although the easement claimed by the complainant is not absolutely necessary for the enjoyment of the estate granted. Smith v. Young, 160 Ill. 163, 43 N. E. 486.

But equity will not interfere to prevent the obstruction of a private right of way by a high board fence and gate, where it appears that the easement has been extinguished by an apparently valid tax sale of the servient estate, and the owner of the easement has other and equally convenient means of access to his land, and will suffer no substantial damage by the obstruction of such right of way. Oswald v. Wolf, 129 Ill. 200, 21 N. E. 839.

The threatened building of a fence along the center of a lane leading from the plaintiff's premises to the highway does not call for injunctive relief, where it does not appear but that the plaintiff has other means of ingress to and egress from his premises equally as convenient as the lane. Young v. Spangler, 2 Ohio C. C. 549. The court said: There is no permanent injury threatened; no destruction of an easement threatened; nothing but a mere trespass such as, under the allegations of the petition, would not prevent ingress to and egress from the premises by some other route; nothing but such an obstruction as could be easily removed, or damages for the obstruction recovered in an action at law.

Injunction is an appropriate remedy to restrain a purchaser of land from permanently closing, by fence and other obstructions, a right of way, where the persistency of the acts complained of is such as to render the remedy by suit inadequate. Weidner v. Dauth, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. 440. The court said: It has been repeatedly and uniformly held that an injunction is the appropriate remedy for the prevention of trespasses and nuisances which, by reason of the persistency with which they are repeated, threaten to become of a permanent nature.

d. Obstruction of public lands or parks.

Public lands.

The government may maintain a suit in equity to compel by mandatory injunction the removal of a fence which the defendant has built partly on his own land and partly on land belonging to the government. United States v. Brighton Rancho Co. 26 Fed. 218. The court said: Whether the act of the defendant comes within the technical definition of purpresture or that of a public nuisance, we are of the opinion that the government can come into a court of equity and by its orders have an end put to the trespass on the public rights. We think, too, an action of injunction is the appropriate remedy, and that an action of ejectment would not furnish full protection to the government. Generally speaking, any encroachment upon the public domain may be restrained or ended by injunction; and in this case it was not the mere fact that the fence is built upon government land, because such fence operates not only as an entry upon the particular land upon which the fence is built, but also to separate the inclosed lands from the general body of the public domain. We think full and adequate remedy can be obtained only in a court of equity, which reaches the individual and compels him to abandon and desist from any encroachment on the public property. See also State v. Goodnight, 70 Tex. 682, 11 S. W. 119, III. e. infra.

So the government may restrain the fencing up and improper use of public land, found in possession of persons under claim or color of title without first resorting to law to determine the latter's rights. United States v. Cleveland & C. Cattle Co. 33 Fed. 323. In this case it is said: The government has not simply the rights of a property owner in respect to these lands; it has all the powers of sovereignty. As the legal title is in the government, the presentation of that title casts upon the defendant the duty of establishing its equities. Practically, is any hardship done, or any rights of the defendant trespassed upon, if the government, in the first instance, comes into a court of equity and invites the defendant then and there to a full and final determination of its rights?

But an injunction sought under the act of February 25, 1885, entitled, "An Act to Prevent Unlawful Occupancy of Public Lands," to restrain the maintenance of an inclosure of property claimed to be public lands, cannot be granted where, pending the litigation, the land inclosed has passed to the state for the support of the public schools, so that thereafter no right or interest of the United States is affected. United States v. Elliott, 74 Fed. 92.

An owner of cattle, who merely desires to exercise the right of pasturing them on public lands, suffers no such special injury by the wrongful fencing in of such lands by a private citizen as will entitle him to equitable relief, even though his land is in close proximity to the lands inclosed. Anthony Wilkinson Live Stock Co. v. McIlquham (Wyo.) 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 733, 83 Pac. 364.

Public parks.

A resident and taxpayer of a corporate town has sufficient interest to maintain an action to enjoin the unauthorized fencing of a public park within the town,—especially if his property abuts thereon. Davenport v. Buffington, 1 Ind. Terr. 424, 45 S. W. 128. In this case the court quotes with approval from Brown v. Manning, 6 Ohio, 298, 27 Am. Dec. 255, which was a suit to enjoin the proprietors who dedicated the land to public use from appropriating to private use a square included in the dedication, and in which it is said: It sufficiently appears that the plaintiff is one of the inhabitants of the town, living and holding property contiguous to the square, the value of which is affected by the dedication. He is therefore not a volunteer, assuming to protect the rights of others, but entitled to this remedy for the protection of both his individual and his common interests.

e. Extent or form of relief.

See also II. e, supra.

In Rogerson v. Shepherd, 33 W. Va. 307, 10 S. E. 632, where an injunction requiring the removal of fences and gates from a way was sought, the court quotes with reference to mandatory injunctions from Kerr on Injunctions, p. 49, as follows: "The jurisdiction has been questioned, but its existence must be admitted as beyond all doubt. It must, however, be exercised with caution, and is strictly confined to cases where the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

remedy at law is inadequate for the purposes of justice, and the restoring things to their former condition is the only remedy which will meet the requirements of the case." The court further observes: The case under consideration is one to which the remedy is peculiarly adapted.

This form of injunctive relief has been frequently awarded.

A mandatory injunction will issue to compel one who has fenced in a public street to remove the obstruction from the highway. Clifton v. Weston, 54 W. Va. 250, 46 S. E. 360.

And a mandatory injunction will lie at the suit of a grantee to compel his grantor to remove a fence and wall placed by him in a street, the existence of which as a highway he is estopped to deny. White v. Tide Water Oil Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 1, 25 Atl. 199.

One who has removed a fence protecting a private way, and built another fence behind it with a gateway for the benefit of the tenants of an adjoining estate, who have no rights therein, will be compelled to rebuild the fence as it originally existed, at the suit of lot owners for whose sole benefit the alley was laid out. Equity is the appropriate remedy for the injury sustained. Greene v. Canny, 137 Mass. 64.

A purchaser of land from which there is no means of egress to the highway, except by passing over adjoining lands, and who, with the consent of the neighboring owner, has used and enjoyed a right of way over such premises for more than twenty years, is entitled to an injunction restraining the obstruction of the way by a fence and gates, and requiring the removal of all gates, fences, or other obstructions. Rogerson v. Shepherd, 33 W. Va. 307, 10 S. E. 632.

A mandatory injunction will be granted for the removal of fences obstructing a driveway at the instance of one entitled to use the driveway, where he has been found guilty of no laches in bringing the suit or asserting his right, and the fences can be easily removed without great and disproportionate injury and loss to defendant's property. Boland v. St. John's Schools, 163 Mass. 229, 39 N. E. 1035.

But an owner of property abutting on a public way cannot maintain an action for a mandatory injunction directing the removal of a fence or bars obstructing the way in that part of it which is, not opposite his land for the reason that his damage is not different in kind from that suffered by the public. The fact that the plaintiff is nearer the obstruction than others makes no difference. Proximity gives him no greater right of passage. Robinson v. Brown, 182 Mass. 266, 65 N. E. 377.

A person may be compelled by mandatory injunction to remove a barbed-wire fence erected partly on the public land and partly on his own, around a large tract of the public domain. United States v. Brighton Ranch Co. 26 Fed. 218.

One who has inclosed public school lands of the state may be compelled to remove the fences, when this can be done without trespassing upon the property of third persons, without reference to the interests of persons who cannot be made parties to the suit. Such portions of the inclosures as are upon the lands of others he cannot be enjoined to remove, although he may have been a party to their erection, unless the owners of the lands are parties to the suit. If he is a part owner of the lands upon which the fences are found, either as partner or cotenant, and has been instrumental in creating the nuisance, he should be compelled to abate it, although his cotenant or partner is not a party to the proceedings, when such cotenant or partner is beyond the reach of the process of the court. State v. Goodnight, 70 Tex. 682, 11 S. W. 119.

The court has no power by interlocutory injunction to compel the removal of a board fence already existing across a street. An interlocutory injunction cannot be used for the purpose of compelling a person to undo what he has already done. The appropriate function of an injunction is to afford preventive relief, not to restore parties to that of which they have already been deprived. World's Columbian Exposition Co. v. Brennan, 51 Ill. App. 128.

A preliminary injunction to restrain the maintenance of a fence across a public way, if not to pull down and destroy it, may be granted in favor of the plaintiff, who made an arrangement with the defendant whereby each dedicated and relinquished lands for a highway leading to the plaintiff's mill, which road the defendant has obstructed with a fence. Ewell v. Greenwood, 26 Iowa, 377.

In Brooks v. South Carolina R. Co. 8 Rich. Eq. 30, one who sought to require another to open alleged streets and refrain from obstructing them with gates was denied relief, where the dedication of the streets had never been accepted, and the plaintiff did not establish a claim to any private right of way. The court said: He asks for relief, whereas the proper jurisdiction of this court in such cases is to prevent irreparable mischief, rather than to redress a wrong consummated.

And in Carlin v. Wolff, 154 Mo. 539, 51 S. W. 679, 55 S. W. 441, it was held that a court of equity will not attempt to restrain the erection of a fence obstructing an alley, where the fence was completed before suit was brought.

But in Downing v. Corcoran, 112 Mo. App. 645, 87 S. W. 114, the repeated wrongful obstruction of gates leading into a private road by posts and wires was enjoined, although the acts complained of were at the beginning of the action accomplished facts. In this case it is said: It is suggested that the acts complained of are now, and were at the beginning of this proceeding, accomplished facts, and that equity will not undertake to restrain the doing of things already done. The case of Carlin v. Wolff, supra, is cited to sustain the suggestion. That case states the general rule of the powerlessness of courts of equity to restrain acts committed before the aid of the court is sought. That rule of law was stated in that case to the single and isolated act of obstructing an alley. But this is a different case. Here the pleader has set up not a single accomplished act, but a series of acts continued through a space of time, each of them being a new obstructive measure to thwart a move of avoidance which the plaintiff would make to overcome a preceding wrongful act on the part of defendant. The defendant, according to plaintiff's bill, was engaged in a series of continuous wrongs, and the proof sustained the allegation. Surely, in such state of case, the injured part must have a time when he can complain with certainty of redress. If the defendant should obstruct plaintiff at every successive point where he endeavored to gain access to the road, and with the evident intention to continue the process, it would be a denial of justice to refuse him relief.

That the public highway had already been obstructed by a fence by the defendant before the granting of an injunction restraining him from so doing is no reason why it should be dissolved, where he threatens to continue the obstruction permanently. In such a case a court of equity alone can furnish adequate redress. Keystone Bridge Co. v. Summers, 13 W. Va. 476.

So, injunctive relief will not be denied a private landowner to restrain the fencing up of a right of way which furnishes the only convenient egress from his land to the public highway, on the ground that the act sought to be enjoined has been already committed. The wrong is a continuing one, for which an action for damages does not afford an adequate remedy. Lakeman v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 36 Mo. App. 363.

A decree enjoining the threatened obstruction of a private alley with a fence is not erroneous, although it had already been closed by a pair of gates when the bill was filed, as that fact does not prevent the enjoining of the acts threatened and remaining to be done completely to deprive complainant of the use of the alley. Newell v. Sass, 142 Ill. 104, 31 N. E. 176.

It seems that relief should be limited to the interest of the complainant in the estate affected by the obstruction.

An injunction restraining the obstruction of a private alley by nailing boards across it should be coextensive with the duration of the easement. Yeager v. Manning, 183 Ill. 275, 55 N. E. 691.

IV. Enjoining interference with fences or gates as waste.

Interference by injunction in restraint of waste was originally founded on privity of title, and courts of equity were for a long time extremely strict in confining their relief to such cases to the exclusion of trespasses by those having no right to the legitimate use of the property injured. The rigor of this rule has now been relaxed to such an extent that equity will interfere, although there is no privy of title, to restrain waste which would result in great or irreparable mischief, not remediable at law, or lead to a multiplicity of suits and to burdensome litigation.

In Cooper v. Hamilton, 8 Blackf. 377, the court refused an injunction in restraint of waste to prevent one alleged to have removed about 700 rails from a fence, from removing the remainder, on the ground that the plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law.

So, the owner of real estate who has been dispossessed by one claiming under a tax deed, and who has instituted an action of forcible entry and detainer for restitution of the property, is not entitled to enjoin the person in possession from removing the fencing about the place, and a dwelling house and other improvements erected by the latter during his occupancy, where, in the action which is still pending, the defendant has given a sufficient bond with ample security, conditioned that he will not commit or suffer waste to be committed on the premises. The plaintiff has an adequate remedy for damages provided he has any remedy. Campbell v. Coonradt, 26 Kan. 67.

In Sapp v. Roberts, 18 Neb. 299, 25 N. W. 96, defendant was perpetually enjoined from committing equitable waste by cutting down an osage-hedge fence between his farm and that of the plaintiff. The court said: An osage-hedge fence is without value except as it is standing and answering the use for which it was intended. Its destruction would be of manifest injury to the inheritance. It is clear that in cases of this kind there is no adequate remedy at law. All persons are entitled to protection in the use, integrity, and value of their property; and, where courts of law cannot give such protection by reason of the inability of plaintiff to prove his damages, equity will interfere.

Waste which would diminish the complainant's security is always a sufficient ground for an injunction as between mortgagor and mortgagee.

In a suit by a mortgagee to restrain the mortgagor, a mining company, from committing waste and thereby diminishing the complainant's security, an injunction may properly issue to restrain the company from carrying away fixtures, buildings, fences, or other erections, or pulling down any fence except as necessary for the ordinary course of its lawful business. Capner v. Fleming, 10 Min. Co. 3 N. J. Eq. 467.

Injunctive relief may be invoked by a landlord to prevent the commission of waste by a tenant. But a lessee of unimproved land, who agreed to pay the taxes thereon and to fence the property for its use, with the privilege of removing the fence unless purchased by the lessor, will not be enjoined from removing it at the suit of a purchaser of the property with knowledge of the lessee's claim to the fence. Jones v. Cooley, 106 Iowa, 165, 76 N. W. 652. A. W. R. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

T. M. HOBBS, Appt.,
v.

LONG DISTANCE TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

(— Ala. —, 41 So. 1003.)

Telephone—burden on highway.

1. The poles and wires of a long-distance telephone strung along a public road do not constitute an additional burden which will entitle the fee owner to compensation, unless he shows that there will be an actual and substantial injury to his property.

Injunction—telephone wire.

2. An injunction will not be granted at the instance of an abutting owner to restrain a telephone company from cutting trees and shrubs along a public highway in the erection of its poles and wires, since the remedy at law is adequate.

(Tyson and Denson, JJ., dissent.)

(June 5, 1906.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Chancery Court for Limestone County dissolving a preliminary injunction granted to restrain the construction of a telephone line along the highway in front of plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. C. Thach, James E. Horton, Jr., and W. R. Walker, for appellant:

A telephone line on a public highway is an additional burden or servitude for which the abutting landowner is entitled to compensation.

Case Note.—Telephone or telegraph as additional servitude on highway:—

This question has already been treated in a case note in 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 323, as well as in a subject note in 24 L.R.A. 721. Since the writing of the case note a few additional cases have been decided, running through which is found the usual conflict of authority.

Thus, in Horton v. Long Distance Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (Ala.) 41 So. 1006 and Richardson v. Long Distance Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (Ala.) 41 So. 1006 (decided without opinion on authority of Hobbs v. Long Distance Teleph. & Teleg. Co.), and in Lowther v. Bridgeman, 57 W. Va. 306, 50 S. E. 410, it is held that the use of a public road for telephone poles and wires does not constitute an additional servitude.

While in Cosgriff v. Tri-State Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (N. D.) 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1142, 107 N. W. 525, and in Burrall v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (Ill.) 79 N. E. 705, it is held that such a use of a public highway is an additional servitude, for which the abutting owners are entitled to compensation.

Appellant has a right to a writ of injunction to prevent the taking of his property by the appellee before the latter has paid just compensation therefor, determinable as to amount by a common-law jury.

Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 U. S. 10, 24 L. ed. 710.

Simpson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill filed in the chancery court by appellant (complainant) against appellee (defendant) alleging that defendant was engaged in the construction of a telephone line across certain lands owned by complainant, and seeking to enjoin further work on the same until payment should be made to the complainant, as compensation for damages to said lands. The defendant filed an answer denying the allegations of the bill, but alleging that it was engaged in constructing said line along the margin of a public road which runs through complainant's land, making as an exhibit a map which shows the location of said line, showing that six trees on the line and a little underbrush will be cut, which, it is alleged are practically of no value, and alleging that, when cut, the same will be left on the land for complainant. Demurrers were also filed to the bill and a motion to dismiss for want of equity. A preliminary injunction was granted, and subsequently the chancellor overruled the demurrers, and motion to dismiss the bill, and dissolved the injunction, and it is from this decree that the appeal is taken by the complainant. A cross-appeal is taken by the defendant, but subsequently dismissed by the cross-appellant, so that the only question raised is the correctness of the chancellor's decree in dissolving the injunction.

While, in the formative period of our system of laws, the courts were partly judicial and partly quasi legislative, meeting each case on its own merits, and thus building up the customs which became the law; yet the principles of the law came to us in their entirety, and, under our written constitutions, it is a cardinal principle that the judicial and legislative departments shall be entirely separate. Nevertheless, it has been true that, in this wonderful age of inventions, the burden rests upon the courts continually of applying the principles of the law to situations and complications of human affairs hitherto undreamed of, and it sometimes becomes a matter of great difficulty to determine just how to preserve those principles and yet meet the demands of justice. Since the days of the Cæsars, public highways have received the careful attention of all governments, not only for the purpose of providing ways by which armies could be moved and the people travel, but for the purpose of opening up avenues of communication by which reports could be speedily brought to the capital, and the interchange of commerce promoted. The laws of Congress have provided for post roads, etc., before the telephone was known, provided for the same privileges for telegraph companies, as were given to railways in using the public lands, and, in later days, it has developed the exceedingly valuable system of "post routes" and free mail delivery along the public roads of the country, so that not the least important function of the public roads of the country is the transmission of messages from place to place. The rights of the abutting owners, and the question as to what is or is not an additional servitude, have furnished material for a vast number of conflicting decisions, so numerous and so conflicting that it would extend an opinion beyond all reasonable limits to attempt an analysis of them; yet a careful examination of them will show a gradual development of the principles of the law in order to accommodate them to the progress of events and the onward march of civilization.

Thus, even in as late and excellent a work as that of Judge Dillon on Municipal Corporations, the rights of surface railways on the streets, and the question as to whether they constitute an additional burden, are spoken of as unsolved problems. And in a note the wise words of Chief Justice Hale are quoted, in which he advises patience in solving these questions, and says: "Time is the wisest thing under heaven. . . . It discovers such varieties of emergencies and cases, and such inconvenience in things, that no man would otherwise have imagined;" and the author of the note goes on to remark, among other things, that "good fruit in the law, as in the natural world, is the product alone of patient cultivation." In a second note the then recent case of Taggart v. Newport Street R. Co. 16 R. I. 668, 7 L.R.A. 205, 19 Atl. 326, is quoted, to the effect that an electric street railway, with its poles and wires, was not an additional servitude. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 734c, and notes.

On this subject, a recent writer states that the judgment of "substantially all of the courts of last resort in the United States," except New York, is that the "ordinary electric street railway with trolley wire," etc., is not an additional burden on a street. Nellis, Street Surface Railroads, pp. 134, 135; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 2d ed. §§ 698, 699, pp. 754, 757.

The progress of thought on this subject is succinctly stated in Joyce on Electric Law, § 341; Keasbey, Electric Wires, §§ 124, 145, conclusion on p. 178.

So, on the subject of erection of poles for electric lighting, on streets, after some contrary decisions, the evident necessity is so great that it has come to be generally understood that it is not an additional burden, though there still remains, in the decisions and text writers, the impression that it is saved by the fact that the light companies generally light the streets as well as private dwellings, and, now, a recent text writer says: "The distinction, however, is not made with respect to pipes for lighting by gas. It seems to be now conceded that city streets may be used for gas pipes, without compensation to abutting owners, whether it be for the purpose of supplying private houses, or for the purpose of lighting the streets and public places. The pipes used for both purposes are generally the same; the purpose is, in a sense, necessary and general, and the streets are the most convenient, if not the only, means of access. The same conditions apply to the electric light. . . . If the purpose is a public purpose for which the streets may be used, it would seem that compensation could not properly be required for the mere occupation of the soil by a pole any more than by a gas pipe." Keasbey, Electric Wires, § 112, p. 139. Other writers have also called attention to the fact that the streets are constantly used for fire plugs, fire alarm stations, and other things necessary for the protection and good order of the city; yet no court would, for a moment, entertain the idea that they are an additional burden, for which the abutter could claim compensation. The last-named writer, we think, suggests the practical solution of these matters, when he says: "It does not follow that the landowner is without redress, if poles be put up so as to interfere with his access, or even so as to be inconvenient or unsightly, or if wires be hung so as to be dangerous, or so as to prevent ready access in case of fire." Keasbey, Electric Wires, § 113, p. 139. "It might tend to a reconciliation of the cases and the adoption of a uniform rule, if the question of new burden were left on one side, and the attention were directed to the practical question whether or not the rights and privileges of the abutting owner . . . were affected." Id. § 145, p. 177. When the property is taken for a public road or street, although technically the fee remains in the abutting owner, yet he cannot interfere with the surface, and it would seem that practically an additional burden, such as would justify an action on his part, should be something which either interfered with or made inconvenient his enjoyment of what remained to him in the land. As to obstructing the road, that would be a matter in which he had no greater right than the public generally; but, if the new use impaired his proper use of his own property in any manner, then, if it could be said to be a use not included within the original grant, it would be a matter for which he would be entitled to compensation. Id. § 124, p. 153.

Judge Elliott says that "the owner who dedicates ground for a street creates an easement extensive enough to permit the city to make any legitimate public use of it which does not impair the right of passage or the right of ingress and egress to and from adjoining property." Elliott, Roads & Streets, 2d ed. § 407, p. 417.

The New Jersey court of chancery declares that "his right [the abutter on a public highway who holds the fee therein] is subordinate to that of the public, and so insignificant, when contrasted with that of the public, that it has been declared to be practically without the least beneficial interest:" also (quoting from Justice Depeue of New Jersey court of errors and appeals) "with respect to lands over which streets have been laid, the ownership, for all substantial purposes, is in the public. Nothing remains in the original proprietor but the naked fee, which, on the assertion of the public right, is divested of all beneficial interest." Halsey v. Rapid Transit Street R. Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 380, 20 Atl. 860. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Courts are not organized to decide academic questions, but to decide upon practical rights of the people, and remedy their real wrongs. It is in accordance with these principles that the courts have held that a steam railroad is an additional burden, because it renders the property of the abutting owner less habitable; while, as shown, the evident trend is to hold that electric lines are not. As said by the supreme court of Michigan: "When they do not interfere with the owner's access to and the use of his land, we see no reason why they should be held to constitute an additional servitude." Joyce, Electric Law, § 336; Detroit City R. Co. v. Mills, 85 Mich. 634, 48 N. W. 1007.

We have indulged in these general remarks, because, as Mr. Cook says, on the subject of telegraph and telephone companies: "The decisions are in irreconcilable conflict." 3 Cook, Corp. 4th ed. § 933. And Mr. Keasbey says [1892 ed. p. 82]: "It is not yet safe to predict which of the two views will finally prevail." Joyce, Electric Law, § 306.

Without referring to the cases, which will be found collated on both sides in the Tennessee case, to which we shall hereafter refer, our conclusion is that the public roads, when dedicated, were dedicated, not merely for travel on foot, or on animals, or in vehicles, but for locomotion by any means that should be afterwards discovered, and for communication between the citizens of the country, by carriers, on foot, or riding, or by any other means that might be found suitable and best. The mails could be sent over them in any way that was found most expeditious. If it had been found advisable to send the mails in metal boxes swung on wires far above the heads of the people, in place of in stages and by carriers, no one would have supposed it was an additional burden upon the abutting owner. So, if it is found better to string wires high above the roads and convey messages by that mysterious something which is in the atmosphere and which seems to be as exhaustless as the bounties of Providence, it is accomplishing one of the great purposes for which public roads are dedicated. Some of the cases have drawn a distinction between urban and suburban roads, but in regard to wires and posts there would be more reason for declaring them burdensome in a city (where they accumulate in such numbers as to interfere with the operation of engines in extinguishing fires) than in the country where there are but few and far away from houses. It has been said that "it is hard to distinguish between a rural and an urban street, and that the nature of a street changes insensibly from the former to the latter, and a rule of property which depends on such a shifting and indefinite distinction is not likely to prove satisfactory." Keasbey, Electric Wires, § 103, p. 127.

We may add that the uses of the telephone are as important in the country as in the city, and it does not take a prophet's ken to see that in the near future they are to perform an important part in bringing the rural districts within the beneficial enjoyment of city improvements. The argument of Justice Devens of the Massachusetts supreme court is satisfactory to us on this general subject, and we think that the qualification which we make, that, if the abutting owner shows that there will be actual and substantial injury to his property, he is entitled to compensation, meets the objections made in the dissenting opinion. Pierce v. Drew, 136 Mass. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 7.

This matter of the rights of abutting owners has been recently considered by the supreme court of Tennessee in an opinion, a certified transcript of which is furnished us, and that court, after giving long lists of the cases on each side of the controversy, takes the ground that one important function of the streets and roads of the country is to furnish means of communication, and that the telephone is only a new and very important invention for accomplishing that end, and does not constitute an additional burden. Frazier v. East Tennessee Teleph. Co. 115 Tenn. 416, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 323, 90 S. W. 620.

Coming to the question of injunctive relief: It will be borne in mind that the right is granted by statute to telegraph and telephone companies to construct their lines "along the margin of the public highways." Code 1896, § 2490.

This right is said to "depend either upon whether such a line constitutes an additional servitude entitling him to compensation [which we have held it does not]; . . . or whether his right of ingress or egress have been impaired, or whether, in some other way, he has been injured in his property rights. . . . Nor will an injunction be granted where the injuries are merely consequential, since a court of law is the proper tribunal in such a case." Joyce, Electric Law, § 1022.

The court of errors and appeals of New Jersey says: "It is impossible to emphasize too strongly the rule so often enforced in this court, that a preliminary injunction will not be allowed where either the complainant's right, which he seeks to have protected in limine by an interlocutory injunction, is in doubt, or where the injury which may result from the invasion of that right is not irreparable." Halsey v. Rapid Transit Street R. Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 367, 20 Atl. 861; Hagerty v. Lee, 45 N. J. Eq. 255, 256, 17 Atl. 826.

Our own court has expressed itself very strongly as to the absolute right of the state to control and use the public thoroughfares for all public purposes, and against the right to enjoin a public improvement authorized thereon. Perry v. New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. 55 Ala. 413, 28 Am. Rep. 740; Western R. Co. v. Alabama G. T. R. Co. 96 Ala. 272, 281, 17 L.R.A. 474, 11 So. 483.

In a more recent case it has declared the absolute right of a municipal corporation to authorize a telephone company, in stringing its wires, to cut trees on the sidewalk, without liability to the abutting owner. Southern Bell Teleph. Co. v. Francis, 109 Ala. 224, 31 L.R.A. 193, 55 Am. St. Rep. 930, 19 So. 1.

In this case it is the right of the public authorities to cut all the trees on the public roads, or to authorize them to be cut, the abutting owner being merely entitled to the wood when felled. And, at any rate, even if the complainant has a right to compensation for the trees, his remedy at law is adequate and complete.

The decree of the Chancery Court is affirmed.

Weakley, Ch. J., and Haralson, Dowdell, and Anderson, JJ., concur.

Tyson, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the view expressed by my brothers. I prefer to follow the lead of the great weight of authority holding that poles and wires of a telephone company, erected along a public country highway, is an additional servitude upon the fee for which the owner must be compensated. I do not regard it as necessary to repeat the reasons for this holding, since they are ably, and, in my opinion, unanswerably, stated in the cases upon which I rely. These cases may be found collated in note on pages 721 and 722 of 24 L.R.A.; note on pages 261-263 of 106 Am. St. Rep. See also Elliott, Roads & Streets, §§ 397, 400 et seq.; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 698a. We need not have any apprehension of depriving people of the use of this quasi public utility by this holding. Indeed, in those states where the cases cited above maintained this principle, the telephone systems, urban and suburban, are far more extensive than in this. The requirement of telephone companies to pay just compensation to the owners of land adjoining the public country roads does not seem to have been an impediment in the way of their extensive construction and operation; but, even if that requirement is an impediment, this could be no possible justification for depriving the owner of his constitutional guaranty.

Denson, J., concurs in these views.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

CAROLINE LESCH, Resp.,
v.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(97 Minn. 503, 106 N. W. 955.)

Homestead—possessory right of wife.

1. A wife has an interest in the homestead of herself and husband, although the legal title thereto is in him; and she is entitled to the peaceful and quiet enjoyment thereof. Any unlawful invasion of such right is a legal wrong against her.

Trespass—fright—damages.

2. In an action to recover damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of fright caused by the wrongful acts of the defendant's employees, it is held that the evidence justified the submission of the cause to the jury, and that it sustains the verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

(Jaggard, J., dissents.)

(April 20, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for wrongful acts of defendant's servants which resulted in injuries to plaintiff through fright. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. L. Countryman and R. A. Hastings, for appellant:

No action for damages for personal injuries will lie because of a trespass to property, where no personal wrong was committed or threatened against the plaintiff, although she may have become "scared" by the trespass.

Headnotes by START, Ch. J.

Note.—This case adds another to the many conflicting decisions on the right to recover for physical injuries resulting from fright caused by a wrongful act. An extensive review and analysis of all the authorities on the question will be found in a subject note in 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 49. See also the following case of Engle v. Simmons, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Mr. Warren H. Mead, for respondent:

Recoverable damages in such cases are allowed and settled in this state when fright results in physical injuries, which are the proximate results of a legal wrong perpetrated against the plaintiff.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff entered upon a verdict for $80 in a personal injury action. This is the second appeal in the case. See 93 Minn. 435, 101 N. W. 965. The sole question presented by the record is whether the defendant was entitled to a direct verdict in accordance with defendant's motion made at the close of all the evidence. The case is here upon a bill of exceptions, which the trial judge certifies contains all of the evidence pertinent or material to the questions raised by the defendant's motion for a directed verdict. Counsel for plaintiff makes the objection that the bill of exceptions does not contain all of the evidence relevant to issues made by the pleadings and submitted to the jury; hence the action of the trial court in denying the defendant's motion cannot be here reviewed. We must accept the certificate of the trial judge as correct, there being nothing properly in the record to impeach it. State v. Ronk, 91 Minn. 419, 98 N. W. 334.

If the record discloses any evidence, taking the most favorable view of it for the plaintiff, sufficient to sustain a verdict for her, the defendant's motion for a directed verdict was properly denied; but, if it does not, the defendant is entitled to judgment notwithstanding the verdict. The alleged wrongful acts on the part of the defendant were committed by two of its employees. No claim is here made by the defendant that there was no evidence to sustain a finding by the jury that such alleged acts were within the scope of the employment of the defendant's employees and in furtherance of its business. This question was settled adversely to the defendant on the first appeal. The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff was sufficient, the jury having found it credible, to establish these facts: On the 21st day of July, 1903, plaintiff was living with her husband and family at 113 Acker street, St. Paul, Minnesota; the premises consisting of a three-room house and one lot, the property and homestead of her husband, Lawrence Desch. About 9:30 A. M. of that day she was alone in the house, the same being her home, and, hearing her dog bark, she went into the yard and saw two men on the outside of the fence looking at some second-hand or worn-out railroad ties which were piled near the fence. These men were the defendant's employees, Charles J. McKenna and Louis Fanger. Some conversation then ensued between her and them upon the subject of railroad ties. McKenna asked plaintiff if the dog would bite, and she replied: "Sure, he will bite." Without asking her permission, and without invitation, the men then opened the gate and entered the yard of the Leach premises, where they remained about half an hour, most of the time engaged in examining and making a written list of a lot of tools which they found in the yard and in a small shed. They put the tools in a pile in the yard near the house, and left them in that position. While they were so engaged she remained in the yard near them and observed what they were doing. She did not at that time know their names, nor that they were defendant's employees, nor did they explain the object of their investigations. They were strangers to her, and she had never seen them before. After examining and listing the tools, the two men, without invitation and without asking plaintiff's permission, opened the door of the Leach dwelling house and entered it; plaintiff following as far as the open door, where she stood and watched them as they went from one room to another. In one room they opened a trunk containing family wearing apparel and underclothing, and threw the contents onto the floor, apparently searching for something. They then went into another room and in like manner searched another trunk and threw the contents (clothing, etc.) onto the floor. They also emptied two hat boxes of their contents, which included a sum of money ($325), also disturbed the contents of a clothes basket in one of the rooms. During these proceedings she was watching them. They did not put anything into their pockets, or attempt to carry anything away. While they were in the house she called a neighbor's little girl, about six years old, who came and stood near her, by the door, looking at the men. They went away. She asked them who they were, and if they had a warrant. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

They told her they had none, but did not tell their names. Neither of the men made any threats against her. Nor did they offer any violence to her person, nor use any violent or improper language to her at any time, and there was no testimony indicating that either of the men had any purpose or intention of injuring or interfering with the plaintiff's person in any manner. She was frightened by their acts, and immediately after they left she became sick, feverish, her head ached, she trembled, and had spells of vomiting. She was obliged to go to bed, and was confined to her bed most of the time for about two weeks, and was not well for a considerable time afterwards. The evidence on the part of the defendant tended to contradict, in many important particulars, the plaintiff's version of what happened on the occasion referred to by her.

1. The defendant's first contention is to the effect that it conclusively appears from the evidence that the plaintiff's alleged fright was not the result of any legal wrong against her; hence she cannot recover any damages resulting therefrom. It is the law of this state that there can be no recovery for fright which results in physical injuries, in the absence of contemporaneous injury to the plaintiff, unless the fright is the proximate result of a legal wrong against the plaintiff by the defendant. Purcell v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 134, 16 L.R.A. 203, 50 N. W. 1034; Sanderson v. Northern P. R. Co. 88 Minn. 162, 60 L.R.A. 403, 97 Am. St. Rep. 509, 92 N. W. 542. While the legal title to the plaintiff's home was in her husband, she had an interest therein. It was her homestead, and she had an interest therein and the same right to its peaceful and quiet enjoyment as her husband had. Any unlawful or wanton invasion of, or interference with, such right would be a legal wrong against her within the meaning of the rule, which is to be liberally construed and applied in cases where the defendant's acts are wanton and ruthless. The evidence tends to show that the defendant's employees not only thus invaded the plaintiff's right to the peaceful enjoyment of her home, of which she was, for the time, the sole occupant, but that they unlawfully interfered with her personal wearing apparel, which, the jury might well have inferred, was included in the family wearing apparel. We hold that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding by the jury that the defendant's employees committed a tort against the plaintiff. Watson v. Dilts, 116 Iowa, 249, 57 L.R.A. 559, 93 Am. St. Rep. 239, 89 N. W. 1068.

2. The defendant's last contention is that the plaintiff's fright and resulting illness were not the proximate result of the acts of the defendant's employees complained of. We are of the opinion that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury in favor of the plaintiff on this question. It is a matter of common knowledge that fright may, and often does, affect the nervous system to such an extent as to cause physical pain and serious bodily injury. The acts complained of in this case were, if committed, an outrageous invasion of the sanctity of the home and the constitutional rights of the citizen, well calculated to frighten the wife and mother left alone in charge of her home. Whether she was frightened by such acts, and whether her illness, which immediately followed, was the proximate result of such acts, were questions of fact for the jury. The trial court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to direct a verdict in its favor.

Judgment affirmed.

Jaggard, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The plaintiff in this case had a cause of action against the defendant. It has been previously held that the defendant was responsible for the acts of its servants in making a search without a warrant. Their interference with the personal property which the jury would have been justified in finding in part belonged to the plaintiff, constituted a trespass to personal property which properly might have been made the basis of recovery. Even if it be conceded that the wife has such an interest in the homestead, the title to which is in her husband's name, as to enable her to recover for an unlawful invasion of her right, I am unable to see how in this case the plaintiff could recover damages sustained by her by reason of fright. If this be conceded, then the plaintiff's causes of action were two, namely: (1) For trespass to her personal property; (2) to real estate in which she had an interest. There was no injury to her person. Trespass vi et armis would not have lain. The trial court certifies, and the record shows, that "plaintiff testified that neither of the men made any threats against her. They did not offer any violence to her person, or use any violent or improper language to her at any time. There was no testimony indicating that either of the men had any purpose or intention of injuring or interfering with the plaintiff's person in any manner. The substance of all the evidence of plaintiff was that the men were engaged in examining and searching for ties and tools outside the house, and in searching trunks, etc., as above stated, inside the house." The law provides full remedy to the individual whose property, real or personal, has been trespassed upon. Such person may, under appropriate circumstances, recover general or special damages, direct or consequential damages; circumstances of insult, humiliation, or outrage may be shown in evidence to aggravate damage, and in appropriate cases vindictive damages will be awarded. "The jury is not bound to weigh in gold scales how much injury a party has sustained by trespass." Davenport v. Russell, 5 Day, 145; McAfee v. Crofford, 13 How. 447, 14 L. ed. 217; Stevens v. Stevens, 96 Ga. 374, 23 S. E. 312; Jefcoat v. Knotts, 13 Rich. L. 50. The cases of aggravated damages will be found collected in volume 46, col. 484, § 143, Century Dig. Cases of exemplary damages will be found collected in the same volume, cols. 488, 492, § 144.

The recovery, however, does not extend to remote damages. Berry v. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. 50 Cal. 435; Butler v. Collins, 12 Cal. 457. It is said, in the majority opinion in this case, to be "the law of this state that there can be no recovery for fright which results in physical injuries, in the absence of contemporaneous injury to the plaintiff, unless the fright is the proximate result of a legal wrong against the plaintiff by the defendant." This rule is too broadly stated, if it means that, when damages caused by fright are the result of any or every legal wrong to plaintiff, or are the result of a legal wrong to plaintiff's property only as distinguished from his person, they are recoverable. It is well settled generally (Victorian R. Comrs. v. Coultas, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 222), and in this state, that there can be no recovery for fright which causes injury without impact; that is, in the absence of any contemporaneous physical injury to the plaintiff. Start, Ch. J., in Sanderson v. Northern P. R. Co. 88 Minn. 162, 60 L.R.A. 403, 97 Am. St. Rep. 509, 92 N. W. 542; citing Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hayter, 93 Tex. 239, 47 L.R.A. 325, 77 Am. St. Rep. 865, 54 S. W. 944, and notes. Neither the invasion of the plaintiff's homestead right, nor the interference with her personal property, constituted impact or contemporaneous physical injury. The case would have been materially different if the defendant's servants had committed either assault or assault and battery upon the plaintiff's person. Accordingly, while I think there might have been a recovery not merely in nominal damages in this case, I also think that the defendant's assignments of error directed to plaintiff's inability to recover merely because she was scared on account of the search were well taken and that the judgment of the trial court should have been reversed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

MARY P. ENGLE, Appt.,

v.

W. B. SIMMONS.

(— Ala. —, 41 So. 1023.)

Personal injury—right of action—trespass on real estate.

1. A woman is not prevented from maintaining an action for injuries to her person by one committing a trespass upon the real estate upon which she resides by the fact that the ownership of the property is in her husband.

Fright—action for injury from.

2. One who causes nervous excitement in a pregnant woman by his wrongful trespass upon her home to such an extent as to cause her miscarriage is liable to her for the bodily pain and suffering endured in direct line of causation from the wrongful act, although no physical violence is done to her person.

Dowdell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by the plaintiff, appellant here, to recover damages for the wrongful act of the defendant, whereby she was caused to suffer great physical pain and consequent temporary physical disability. The complaint as amended contained five counts, to all of which a demurrer was sustained by the trial court, and the plaintiff declining to plead over, a judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant.

The principal and important question in the case is: Does the complaint as amended state a cause of action? It is a sound and just principle of law that, where one, in violation of the law, does an act which in its consequences is injurious to another, he is liable for the damages caused by such wrongful act. Van Norden v. Robinson, 45 Hun, 567. The allegations of the complaint show that the defendant entered into the dwelling house of the plaintiff, who was at the time far advanced in pregnancy, and in the absence of her husband, and with the evident purpose of collecting a claim against the husband, and after being informed by the plaintiff that her husband was absent from home, and after having been requested by plaintiff to leave the premises, he refused without legal cause or good excuse to do so, persisting in interrogating the plaintiff and in taking an inventory of her household effects, making at the time threats of what he intended to do, whereby the plaintiff was thrown into a state of nervous excitement, bringing on labor pains attended with unusual severity continuing for three days, and resulting in the premature birth of a child, and causing a physical disability to the plaintiff which for a long time incapacitated her for the discharge of her household duties. That the defendant violated the law in his refusal to immediately leave the premises when ordered to do so, there can be no question, and that his subsequent conduct as alleged was wrongful is equally certain. The action was properly brought in the name of the wife. Code 1896, §§ 2523, 2527. The suit is for an injury to the plaintiff, and not for a trespass to the realty, as supposed by appellee. It is wholly immaterial, under the circumstances alleged, whether the ownership of the premises was in the plaintiff or her husband, although it is averred that the possession of the dwelling was held under a contract of lease made by the wife. In Watson v. Dilts, 116 Iowa, 249, 57 L.R.A. 561, 93 Am. St. Rep. 239, 89 N. W. 1068, it was said: "Nor does it matter, in our judgment, that the trespass was committed on property belonging to the husband. It was her home as well as that of her husband, . . . and any unlawful entry or invasion thereof which produced physical injury to her was a wrong for which she ought to recover."

Nor is it important that no physical violence was done her person. The bodily pain and suffering which she endured were in direct line of causation from the alleged wrongful act of the defendant. Armstrong v. Montgomery Street R. Co. 123 Ala. 233, 26 So. 349. In a case similar to the one under consideration the supreme court of Texas, in an opinion by Gaines, J., said: "That a physical, personal injury may be produced through a strong emotion of the mind there can be no doubt. The fact that it is more difficult to produce such an injury through the operation of the mind than by direct physical means affords no sufficient ground for refusing compensation in an action at law, when the injury is intentionally or negligently inflicted. It may be more difficult to prove the connection between the alleged cause and the injury, but if it be proved, and the injury be the proximate result of the cause, we cannot say that a recovery should not be had. . . . Here, according to the allegations in the petition, the defendant has produced a bodily injury by means of that emotion, and it is for that injury that the recovery is sought." Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210, 7 L.R.A. 619, 13 S. W. 59. In the case of Brownback v. Frailey, 78 Ill. App. 262, it was said: One who goes to the house of a pregnant woman and flourishes a whip, and makes threats in a boisterous manner, is liable for her miscarriage and sickness, resulting from fright proximately occasioned thereby, which fright he must have observed by the exercise of ordinary care, even though he did not know of the condition of her health. To the same effect are the following cases: Watson v. Dilts, supra; Razzo v. Varni, 81 Cal. 289, 22 Pac. 848; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Hunerberg, 16 Ill. App. 387; Newell v. Whitcher, 53 Vt. 589, 38 Am. Rep. 703. The plaintiff here was in her home, and had a right to the peaceful and undisturbed enjoyment of the same, and any unlawful entry or invasion thereof, which produced physical injury to her, whether by direct personal violence, or through nervous excitement the proximate result of the wrongful acts of the defendant, was a wrong for which she is entitled to recover.

It follows from the foregoing views that the trial court, in our opinion, erred in sustaining the demurrer to the amended complaint, and for which error the judgment appealed from must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

LITTLE ROCK RAILWAY & ELECTRIC COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

O. C. GOERNER.

Carrier—refusal to honor transfer—damages.

1. A street-car passenger who is given an invalid transfer check upon paying his fare and asking for a transfer, to which he is entitled, cannot, upon refusal by the conductor of the connecting car to honor it, refuse to pay his fare, thereby rendering necessary forcible ejection, and hold the carrier liable for the assault; but his remedy is confined to damages for the breach of contract, including reasonable compensation for the indignity put upon him through the fault of the company.

Same—assault.

2. A street car company is liable not only for actual and compensatory damages, but for punitive damages also, if its conductor willfully refuses to honor a valid transfer under circumstances of insult and aggravation, followed by an assault upon the passenger.

Instructions—rights of passenger.

3. An instruction that a street-car passenger is entitled to courteous treatment, and that the carrier is liable if he is not treated with care and courtesy, without more explicitly defining the duty of the carrier towards him, is too uncertain.

Same—absence of evidence.

4. The jury should not be instructed as to the rights of a street-car passenger whose transfer was dishonored if he intended to pay his fare, where the evidence is that he intended to rely on his transfer and refuse further payment.

Counsel—erroneous argument.

5. It is improper for counsel to attempt to get before the jury by argument evidence which could not be produced by direct proof.

(July 23, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pulaski County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to re-street-car transfer. One line of authorities supports the view that the transfer received by the passenger must be considered as conclusive evidence to the conductor of the passenger's right to ride. These cases hold that, if the transfer is inaccurate, the expulsion of the holder upon refusal to pay additional fare is justified, although the mistake or defect is due to the negligence of the conductor who issued the transfer.

This doctrine finds support in Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co. 135 Mass. 407, 46 Am. Rep. 481, in which the court held that a passenger who receives an incorrect transfer check from the conductor of the first car without examination, although he is able to read, cannot refuse to pay his fare to the conductor of the second car who refuses to honor the check, where the passenger is familiar with the practice of the street car company to give checks differing in language and color according to the line on which they are to be used. The court thus summarized the arguments in support of its position: "The conductor of a street-railway car cannot reasonably be required to take the mere word of a passenger that he is entitled to be carried by reason of having paid a fare to the conductor of another car, or even to receive and decide upon the verbal statements of others as to the fact. The conductor has other duties to perform, and it would often be impossible for him to ascertain and decide upon the right of the passenger, except in the usual, simple, and direct way. The checks used upon the defendant's road were transferable, and a proper check, when given, might be lost or stolen, or delivered to some other person. It is no great hardship upon the passenger to put upon him the duty of seeing to it, in the first instance, that he receives and presents to the conductor the proper ticket or check; or, if he fails to do this, to leave him to his remedy against the company for a breach of its contract. Otherwise, the conductor must investigate and determine the question, as best he can, while the car is on its passage." 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Similar language was employed by the court in the case of Woods v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 48 Mo. App. 125, in which a like decision was rendered.

Under such circumstances, this line of cases holds it to be the duty of a passenger to pay his fare, or peaceably leave the car, and enforce his rights in an appropriate way by an action for breach of contract to carry him. Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co. supra; Norton v. Consolidated R. Co. 79 Conn. 109, 63 Atl. 1087; Kiley v. Chicago City R. Co. 189 Ill. 384, 52 L.R.A. 626, 82 Am. St. Rep. 460, 59 N. E. 794.

And, if the passenger refuses to pay his fare or peaceably leave the car, and consequently is ejected, he has no right of action against the company for damages for his ejection (Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co. supra; Norton v. Consolidated R. Co. supra, in which only nominal damages were allowed; Kiley v. Chicago City R. Co. supra); unless the one in charge of the car uses more force than is necessary. (Ibid.).

There is another line of decisions which denies the transfer such conclusive force, and holds that the passenger has a right to rely upon the acts and statements of the conductor issuing the transfer, and, if he is expelled from the second car on account of a mistake or defect in the transfer, notwithstanding he acts in good faith and offers a reasonable explanation, the carrier is liable in damages for such expulsion. These authorities declare it to be the duty of the conductor to whom the transfer is offered to listen to the reasonable explanation of the passenger, and he must, at his peril, determine whether the passenger is entitled to ride upon the transfer, notwithstanding it does not upon its face show such right. In support of this doctrine, see Georgia R. & Electric Co. v. Baker, 125 Ga. 562, 54 S. E. 639; Hornesby v. Georgia R. & Electric Co. 120 Ga. 913, 48 S. E. 339; Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Clark, 33 Ind. App. 190, 104 Am. St. Rep. 249, 71 N. E. 53; Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Wilson, 161 Ind. 153, 100 Am. St. Rep. 261, 66 N. E. 950, 67 N. E. 993;

cover damages for alleged wrongful ejection from defendant's car. Reversed.

Statement by Wood, J.:

The appellee alleged that on September 3d he boarded and paid his fare on a car of appellant going north on Main street, which was bound for East Markham street, and obtained a transfer to a West Markham street car; that the conductor of said west-bound car took up his transfer ticket, and, without fault of plaintiff, called him a deadbeat, and struck him over the eye with some instrument, inflicting severe wounds on his head and face, and pushed and pressed him back upon the railing of the car, inflicting wounds on his back and shoulders; that the transfer ticket was presented within the proper time, and the conductor was in the line of his employment at the time he committed the assault and battery upon the plaintiff. He prayed for judgment in the sum of $1,500. The appellant denied that plaintiff became a passenger on its west-bound car, and that its conductor took up his transfer ticket, and then, without fault of his, called him a deadbeat and struck him over the eye; denied that the transfer ticket was presented within the proper time, and that plaintiff was entitled to ride thereon; and, further answering, alleged that, if there was any difficulty between plaintiff and its conductor, such difficulty was provoked by abusive language and insulting conduct toward the conductor. The appellee testified, in substance, that he boarded one of appellant's East Markham street cars between Sixth and Seventh on O'Rourke v. Citizen's Street R. Co. 103 Tenn. 124. 46 L.R.A. 614, 76 Am. St. Rep. 639, 52 S. W. 872; Carpenter v. Washington & G. R. Co. 3 Mackey, 227.

Although the conductor personally may have been justified by his instructions in ejecting a passenger who tendered a transfer incorrectly punched by the conductor of the first car, yet the court, in Muckle v. Rochester R. Co. 79 Hun, 32, 29 N. Y. Supp. 732, held that the street car company was put in the wrong by the act of the first conductor, and was no more justified in an attempt to eject the passenger than it would have been if he had at the time presented the evidence of his right to remain as a passenger in the car without further payment; and therefore the company was held liable for such violence upon the person of the passenger as was used by the conductor for the purpose of ejecting him.

And the right to damages for such expulsion was held, in O'Rourke v. Citizens' Street R. Co. supra, not to be affected by a condition on the transfer check that the passenger agrees to pay the regular fare in case of controversy with the conductor about the check, and then apply at the office of the company for reimbursement; since such a condition was considered to be void because unreasonable.

The following cases held that the law does not impose upon the passenger the duty to inspect the transfer, but that the passenger has the right to assume that the agent of the company has correctly discharged his duty in punching the check. Memphis Street R. Co. v. Graves, 110 Tenn. 232, 100 Am. St. Rep. 803, 75 S. W. 729; Moon v. Interurban Street R. Co. 85 N. Y. Supp. 363; Georgia R. & Electric Co. v. Baker, supra; Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Wilson, supra; Lawshe v. Tacoma R. & Power Co. 29 Wash. 682, 59 L.R.A. 350, 70 Pac. 118.

It was considered unreasonable in Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Wilson, supra, to require a passenger, upon receiving a transfer containing many words, figures, spaces, and abbreviations, which to many is prima facie unintelligible, to inspect the same in order to discover if the conductor has made a mistake in the performance of his duty.

A condition printed on a street-railway transfer check that the passenger shall examine date, time, and direction, and see that they are correct, was held to be void for unreasonableness, in O'Rourke v. Citizens' Street R. Co. supra,—especially when these matters are so complex that an inexperienced passenger cannot examine them and see that they are correct within the time of disposal and without explanation.

The ejection of a passenger from a car which he would have been entitled to take if the time on his transfer check had been properly punched was held, in Eddy v. Syracuse Rapid Transit R. Co. 50 App. Div. 109, 63 N. Y. Supp. 645, and Jacobs v. Third Ave. R. Co. 71 App. Div. 198, 75 N. Y. Supp. 679, to be wrongful, and entitled him to damages, where he did not know the transfer was defective, and was too ignorant to tell whether it was punched correctly or not.

In Laird v. Pittsburg Traction Co. 166 Pa. 4, 31 Atl. 51, the court held a street car company liable for the ejection of a passenger by a conductor who refused to accept a transfer, on the corner of which was the sentence, "It is the duty of the person receiving this, and one of the conditions upon which this check is accepted, that the passenger examine date and time and see that the same are correct," and which contained two time punches, one correct and the other incorrect, and which had been given to the passenger on leaving the first car without allowing him sufficient opportunity to ascertain whether the transfer was incorrect, if such was the case.

On the general subject of the duty of a passenger to pay fare wrongfully demanded in order to avoid expulsion and lessen damages, see exhaustive subject note in 43 L.R.A. 706.

Main street; that the car was going north; that he paid his fare, called for and received a transfer to Pulaski Heights; that at Main and Markham he boarded a Pulaski Heights car immediately after debarking from the car on which he was riding. The conductor was the same who on a previous occasion had compelled appellee and his wife to get off the car. He took up appellee's transfer and asked him if he got his transfer the other night. Appellee answered in the affirmative, whereupon the conductor called him "a liar and deadbeat," and pounded appellee with a "billet," inflicting upon him painful injuries in his eye, back, and shoulder. W. H. Rankin, a justice of the peace, testified that there was a trial or investigation of the conductor before him, and that Mr. Loughborough, one of the attorneys for the street car company, represented the conductor. The testimony on behalf of the appellant tended to show that the fight between the conductor and Goerner was brought on by the latter; that he presented a transfer ticket to the conductor at 10:30 o'clock that was issued at 9 o'clock. The transfer ticket was therefore an hour and a half late, and void under the rules of the company, according to the testimony on behalf of appellant. There was testimony also tending to prove that the transfer ticket was from a Fifteenth street car, instead of an East Markham, as claimed by appellee. There was testimony that appellee had boarded the same car at the same place two or three times before that, and presented transfers that were late, which the conductor refused to accept. When the conductor called appellee's attention to these things, he said he was not going to pay another fare. Thereupon the conductor said to him: "It looks to me like you are trying to beat anyway." Then appellee "grabbed" the conductor by the throat, and the latter struck appellee one blow "to protect himself." Such was substantially the testimony of the conductor. He contradicted the testimony of appellee in every material statement, and the testimony of the conductor was corroborated by other witnesses who were on the car at the time, and also by the motorman.

The court gave, at the request of appellee, the following instructions: "(1) If you find from the evidence that plaintiff took a car of the defendant on Main street, paid his fare, and obtained a transfer ticket from the conductor on said car, and took a Pulaski Heights car intending to present said ticket to the conductor of said Pulaski Heights car, the plaintiff became a passenger on said car, and was entitled to courteous treatment at the hands of said conductor; and if you find that he was, without fault on his part, not treated with care and courtesy, you will find for the plaintiff. (2) You are instructed that, if you find for the plaintiff, you may find for him in such a sum as, in your judgment, will compensate him for pain and suffering, humiliation, and loss of time which you may find he sustained by reason of said injury. (3) You are instructed that, if you find from the evidence that the conductor wilfully and wrongfully struck and injured plaintiff, you may find by way of punishment in addition to any actual damages sustained, if you find any actual damages were sustained, such additional damages by way of punishment as in your judgment will deter others from like conduct again. (4) If you find from the evidence that plaintiff boarded a car with a transfer, which he believed to be good and valid, you will find for the plaintiff on this point, although you may find as a matter of fact said transfer ticket was invalid, unless you further find that plaintiff did not intend to pay fare."

The court also gave the following: "If you find from the evidence that the transfer ticket which plaintiff presented to the conductor of defendant was received by plaintiff previous to or at the hour shown by the punch mark on said ticket, and that plaintiff did not present it for payment of his passage on the first Pulaski Heights car passing Markham and Main after he left the other car, then the court instructs you that the transfer ticket was invalid and the conductor was not obliged to receive it. And if you further find that at the time plaintiff boarded the Pulaski Heights car he knew that the transfer ticket was invalid because it was stale, but that he boarded said car intending to use it for his passage [not intending to pay his fare any other way], then the relation of carrier and passenger did not exist between plaintiff and defendant, and [if conductor and plaintiff engaged in an independent fight] railway company is not liable." The words in brackets represent the modification which the court made to the request as it was asked by appellant. The court refused the request as presented, but modified and gave it in the manner indicated. Appellant objected to the ruling of the court in refusing its request as offered, and in making the modification.

In his opening argument to the jury counsel for appellee used the following language: "Mrs. Goerner was a passenger on that car and gave up one of these transfers; but she being the wife of the plaintiff in this case, and the law being that the wife cannot testify for or against her husband, her mouth is sealed. We cannot hear anything from her. Usually a woman makes a good witness. She is quick to see and notice details. It makes a deeper impression on her than anybody else." And in his closing argument counsel for appellee made use of the following: "Now the conductor is not in the employ of the street car company any more, and you noticed when I asked, 'What were you discharged for?' they said, 'Oh, we object,' and I did not get to show, and could not show, why he got out." Objections were made by appellant to the above remarks at the time, and the court was asked to exclude same from the jury. The court refused, and appellant saved its exceptions to the court's ruling. The verdict was for $160. Judgment was entered accordingly, which this appeal seeks to reverse.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

First. No objection was made and exception saved at the trial to the portion of the testimony of W. H. Rankin, which appellant now urges as error. We will therefore not consider that question.

Second. A street railway may make and enforce reasonable rules to facilitate its business, and to protect itself from fraud and imposition. So long as these rules are not inconsistent with the rights of the public to transportation over the company's road, and do not impose unnecessary and unreasonable burdens upon them, they will be enforced. Booth, Street Railways, § 237; Nellis, Street Surface Railroads, p. 440, § 8; Clark, Acci. Law, § 81. A rule requiring transfer tickets showing the right of passengers who pay a single fare to ride upon the different cars and to various points on the company's road is reasonable. Where a passenger on a street car pays his fare, and calls for and receives a transfer ticket, which is void upon its face, and which is refused when presented to another conductor, he, nevertheless, had a valid contract with the company to be carried to his place of destination, and the company, in expelling him from its car for a refusal to pay additional fare, violates its contract, and is liable in damages for its breach. Thus far there is practical unanimity in the adjudications. But, as to the measure of damages for such breach, and whether the action shall sound in tort for wrongful expulsion or be confined solely to one ex contractu, there is great diversity of opinion. See Clark, Acci. Law, § 83, p. 196, and O'Rourke v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 103 Tenn. 124, 46 L.R.A. 614, 76 Am. St. Rep. 639, 52 S. W. 872, where the authorities pro and con are cited and reviewed. Mr. Freeman in his exhaustive notes to Com. v. Power, 41 Am. Dec. 465 (7 Met. 596), states the rule upon the subject as to commercial railways as follows: "If, by a mistake of one of the officers of the company, he is not furnished with a proper ticket or check evidencing his right to be carried to his destination, his right, nevertheless, remains, and if, for want of the requisite evidence of that right, another servant of the company refuses to carry him without another payment of fare, the contract is broken, and he has a complete right of action for all damages resulting from such breach. But, as the rule requiring him to show a proper ticket or to pay his fare, if demanded, is a reasonable one, he will not be justified in refusing compliance with it, and in remaining in the car until forcibly expelled, merely for the purpose of heaping up damages. He should either pay the fare demanded or quit the train; and in either case we think he ought to recover as a part of his damages reasonable compensation for the indignity put upon him by the company through the default of its servant. But he can add nothing to his claim by remaining in the car until forcibly ejected, for the rule under which he is ejected, being reasonable, is a complete protection to the company and its servants against the recovery of any damages directly or indirectly, for an assault made necessary by his own obstinacy, if no more violence than is required for his ejection is used." This rule is equally applicable to street railways, and is, we believe, based upon better reason than those authorities which hold to a different view. Judge Taft, in Poulin v. Canadian P. R. Co. 17 L.R.A. 800, 3 C. C. A. 23, 6 U. S. App. 208, 52 Fed. 197, says: "The law settled by the great weight of authority . . . is that the face of the ticket is conclusive evidence to the conductor of the terms of the contract of carriage between the passenger and the company. The reason for this is found in the impossibility of operating railways on any other principle; with a due regard to the convenience and safety of the rest of the traveling public, or the proper security of the company in collecting its fares. The conductor cannot decide from the statement of the passenger what his verbal contract with the ticket agent was in the absence of the counter evidence of the agent. To do so would take more time than a conductor can spare in the proper and safe discharge of his manifold and important duties, and it would render the company constantly subject to fraud and consequent loss. The passenger must submit to the inconvenience of either paying his fare or ejection, and rely upon his remedy in damages against the company for the negligent mistake of the ticket agent." See, also, for a cogent statement of the reasons for the rule, Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co. 135 Mass. 407, 46 Am. Rep. 481.

The strongest cases we have read, to wit, O'Rourke v. Citizens' Street R. Co. supra, and Lawshe v. Tacoma R. & Power Co. 29 Wash. 682, 59 L.R.A. 350, 70 Pac. 118, holding that, under circumstances similar to the case at bar, the passenger may refuse to pay his fare, suffer ejection, and then sue the railway company for the wrongful expulsion, are not in conflict with the rule we have announced as to the liability of the railway company. They differ only as to the nature of the action, and the consequent measure of damages. It follows that under either rule the appellee was a passenger at the time of the alleged assault upon him. Under the rule we have announced, had there been nothing more than a refusal to accept the transfer ticket, a demand for additional fare, and upon refusal an expulsion without using more force than necessary to accomplish the purpose, the railway company would have been liable only for a breach of its contract. But, under the allegations of the complaint and the testimony on behalf of appellee, there was a wilful breach of the contract under such circumstances of insult and aggravation as to constitute a tort. Fordyce v. Nix, 58 Ark. 136, 23 S. W. 967. These allegations, if true, would render appellant liable not only for actual and compensatory, but also for punitive, damages. While we do not find the first instruction obnoxious to the particular objections urged against it in brief of counsel, the latter portion of it was erroneous. It told the jury that, if appellee became a passenger, he "was entitled to courteous treatment," and if he was without fault, and "not treated with care and courtesy," he was entitled to recover. The court should have defined the duty of appellant to appellee to use ordinary care to protect him, if he became a passenger, from insults and injuries, and should have told the jury that in case appellee was a passenger if the conduct of appellant's conductor towards him as alleged in the complaint was established by the evidence, that it would render appellant liable. The instruction allowed the jury to generalize and speculate as to what would be "courteous treatment," and left them to say what "care and courtesy" was due from appellant to appellee. That is too uncertain. Jurors might differ greatly in their ideas of what would be "courteous treatment." The law fixes the standard and defines the measure of appellant's duty in such cases. The learned counsel for appellant has made no criticism of the instruction upon this ground. He seems to concede that, if appellee was a passenger, (which the jury found), the conduct of the conductor towards him would render appellant liable, and this is true, for, if appellee was a passenger, the conductor had no right to insult him by saying as he says he did: "It looks to me like you are trying to beat anyway." Therefore, we will treat the error pointed out as nonprejudicial; but we call attention to it so that a correct declaration may be given upon a new trial. The cause must be reversed for an error hereafter indicated.

There was no error in the second and third instructions given at the request of appellee. In the fourth the meaning is not clearly expressed, but it doubtless intended to tell the jury that, if appellee boarded appellant's car with a transfer ticket which he believed to be valid, but which as a matter of fact turned out to be void, that he would still be a passenger if he intended to pay his fare. The instruction was abstract and prejudicial. There was no proof that appellee intended to pay his fare, if the transfer ticket was invalid. On the contrary, the undisputed evidence is that he "was not going to pay another fare." Under the rule we have announced supra, appellee was a passenger if he had paid his fare which entitled him to a proper transfer ticket, even though the ticket given him was invalid, provided he presented such transfer ticket in proper time, and on the proper car. He was a passenger under such circumstances, whether he intended to pay an additional fare or not, in case the transfer ticket given him was refused. The only contention of appellee in the lower court, as shown by the pleadings and proof, was that he had paid his fare and had received a transfer ticket which he presented at the proper time and on the proper car, and that this established between him and appellant the relation of passenger and carrier which entitled him to recover for injuries alleged. On the other hand, it was the contention of appellant that appellee had not paid his fare, and had not received a transfer ticket which he presented at the proper time and place, but that appellee was attempting to defraud the company by offering and claiming the right to ride on a spent or bogus transfer ticket, and appellant adduced evidence tending to prove its contention. Appellant was therefore entitled to an instruction presenting this theory to the jury. The court was asked to give such an instruction in appellant's request No. 8. But the court refused it as asked, and modified it by allowing the jury to find that, if appellee had not paid his fare in the manner indicated in his complaint and proof, that he might have intended to pay it in some other way. This was not only without evidence to support it, but, as we have shown, there was positive and undisputed evidence to the contrary. Appellant's request for instruction No. 8 was correct as asked, and should have been granted without modification.

Third. The remarks of counsel for appellee, both in the opening and closing argument, was an effort to place before the jury as evidence indirectly by argument that which could not be produced directly in the proof. The remarks were highly improper. But, inasmuch as the cause must be reversed for the errors indicated in the instructions, it is unnecessary to determine whether or not the remarks constituted reversible error. It is safe to assume they will not be repeated.

Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

GEORGIA RAILWAY & ELECTRIC COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

MRS. C. L. BAKER.

Carrier—transfer—consideration.

1. Although a street railway company may not be required by law to carry a passenger on any other line than the one over which the car originally boarded runs, still, if such company holds out that it will, when fare is paid on the first car, issue a transfer giving the right to ride on other cars of its lines, a request for a transfer is an acceptance of this offer, and the delivery of the transfer completes a contract under which the passenger is entitled to demand the right to ride on both the original car and the transfer car; and the amount paid to the conductor of the first car is the consideration for the right to ride on each car. The right to ride on the car to which the passenger is transferred is in no sense a gratuity.

Same—mistake—right of passenger.

2. If a mistake is made by the conductor of the first car in issuing a transfer, and the passenger presents the transfer to the conductor of the second car and gives a reasonable explanation of the mistake of the conductor of the first car, the conductor of the second car must, at his peril, determine whether the passenger is entitled to ride upon the transfer, notwithstanding it does not upon its face show such right.

Same—condition.

3. A condition on a transfer issued by a street railway company that "the holder, by accepting, agrees that, should any controversy arise as to its validity, holder will pay fare and call at company's office for correction," is unreasonable and void.

Headnotes by COBB, P. J.

Note. — The rights and duties of a street-car passenger who has received an erroneous transfer are considered in the note to Little Rock R. & Electric Co. v. Goerner, ante, 97.

Same—threat of expulsion.

4. A threat by the conductor of the second car to expel a passenger on account of a mistake in the transfer slip is a legal wrong, giving the passenger a right of action against the company, notwithstanding there is nothing insulting in the words or manner of the conductor, further than that a mere threat to expel might be deemed an insult.

Same—measure of damages.

5. In an action brought to recover damages for a threat to expel a passenger from a street car, who presented a transfer to the conductor which was defective through no fault of the plaintiff, but who, under the facts of the case, was entitled to a ride on the car, the measure of damages is not limited to the amount paid to prevent an expulsion, but general damages may be recovered as for an inexcusable trespass, even though there be no aggravating circumstances connected with the threat of expulsion.

Instruction—error.

6. While the evidence demanded a finding in favor of the plaintiff so far as the right to recover was concerned, the erroneous instruction in relation to the worldly circumstances of the parties was of such a character as to require the granting of a new trial.

(May 18, 1906.)

ERROR to the City Court of Atlanta to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for attempted ejection of plaintiff from defendant's car. Reversed.

Statement by Cobb, P. J.:

Mrs. Baker sued the street railway company for damages. The petition alleged that she boarded a car of the defendant at Grant Park, in the city of Atlanta, about 3:30 p. m.; that she paid her fare and requested of the conductor a transfer to the Marietta street line, and in response a transfer was given to her by the conductor. On arrival at the transfer point established under the rules of the company, she inquired how long she would have to wait for a Marietta street car, and the conductor told her that the car was then approaching, and pointed to it. The plaintiff alighted and immediately boarded the Marietta street car, which was the first car on that line passing after her arrival. The conductor of this car approached plaintiff, and she gave to him the transfer slip which had been given to her by the conductor of the other car. He refused to honor the transfer, and demanded that she pay another fare, threatening to eject her if she refused to do so. This was all done in an insulting manner; the conductor charging her with having had the transfer since 11 o'clock A. M. The bell was rung in order to eject her, and she paid to the conductor a fare. He was proceeding to eject her at the time, and she paid the fare under protest. The car was filled with passengers, and the threats of the conductor that he would eject her were made in the presence of these passengers, among whom were a number of her acquaintances. She was humiliated and mortified, and her feelings greatly wounded. The petition avers that it was the duty of the defendant to carry her to her destination on Marietta street without extra pay, and she prays for damages, actual, punitive, and vindictive. Damages were laid in the sum of $1,500. By amendment, a copy of the transfer slip is attached to the petition as an exhibit. Upon this transfer appears the following: "This transfer is good for one continuous trip on the route punched, provided it is presented at the first intersecting point by the person to whom originally issued, and used on the date and before the expiration of time punched, and upon first car passing transfer point for route shown, and is otherwise subject to the rules of the company. . . . This transfer is issued upon further condition, and holder by accepting agrees, that should any controversy arise as to its validity, holder will pay fare and call at company's office for correction." On the transfer appear the names of the streets on which the lines of the company run. The street on which the first car was boarded is marked by a punch. Marietta street is not so marked, but there is a punch mark on Magnolia street. The punch marks indicate 11 o'clock as the hour at which the transfer was issued, but this mark does not appear in the column headed "A. M." or in the column headed "P. M." The defendant filed an answer, in which it admitted some of the allegations of the petition and denied others. The defense set up was in effect a denial of liability, on the ground that the transfer did not upon its face confer the right to ride. The allegations as to the alleged wrongful conduct of the conductor were all denied. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $60. The defendant excepted to the judgment refusing a new trial.

Messrs. O. E. Horton and M. C. Horton for defendant in error.

Cobb, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is conceded that there is no law of this state, and no valid ordinance of the city of Atlanta, requiring street railway companies to issue transfers to passengers, authorizing them to ride upon a car other than the one which they originally board. This fact being conceded, the argument is made that the right to ride upon the second car, resulting from the issuance of the transfer, is a mere gratuity. This is not true. The issuance of transfers is a voluntary act on the part of the company, using the word "voluntary" in its ordinary sense. The company is not bound to issue transfers. It is under no obligation to transfer the passenger to any other point than one on the line of the car originally boarded. But when the company voluntarily and without any compulsion adopts the custom of issuing transfers for the consideration paid the conductor of the first car, it binds itself by a contract to transport the passenger from the point where he enters the car to a point on any line to which, under the custom of the company, it is usual to issue transfers. In the absence of a custom, the company simply sells to the passenger, for the fare paid, the right to ride between points on the first line. Under a custom of issuing transfers, the offer is made for a stated consideration to transfer the passenger from a point on one line to a point on any other line embraced within the custom. When the passenger pays his fare to the conductor of the first car and requests a transfer, and a transfer is delivered, the offer arising under the custom is accepted, and the contract becomes complete, and the one fare is the consideration for the transportation of the entire journey. The company does not contract merely for the journey on the first line and donate a journey on the second line. Some companies will issue tickets entitling passengers to six rides for 25 cents, when the usual fare paid is 5 cents for each ride. No one would seriously contend that only the first five rides, under such circumstances, were paid for, and the sixth was a mere donation. The company is in the business of selling rides. It may fix the amount which shall be paid for a ride upon either one or more cars. When this amount is paid, the passenger is a purchaser of a ride between the points covered by the contract. This is true, whether or not, as an original proposition, the passenger could demand a right to ride between these points for the amount paid. The position that the transferred passenger is receiving a mere gratuity when he rides upon the second car is untenable.

2. Whether the transfer slip used by a street railway company is to be looked to as conclusive evidence of a right to ride on a second car, and whether any mistake made in the issuance of the transfer, resulting in its showing upon its face that the right to ride upon the second car does not exist, is a question about which the courts are not agreed. According to some of the decisions, the transfer received must be considered as conclusive evidence of the passenger's right to ride, although it may not in its true sense express or evidence the contract into which the passenger enters. These decisions hold that, if the transfer is inaccurate, the expulsion of the holder upon refusal to pay additional fare is justified, although the mistake or defect is due to the negligence of the conductor who issued the transfer. On the other hand, there are numerous decisions which deny the transfer such conclusive force and dignity, and rule that the passenger has a right to rely upon the acts and statement of the conductor issuing the transfer, and, if he is expelled from the second car on account of a mistake or defect in the transfer, notwithstanding he has acted in good faith and offered a reasonable explanation, the carrier is liable in damages for such expulsion. See the cases cited in Hornesby v. Georgia R. & Electric Co. 120 Ga. 913, 48 S. E. 339, and in the note to that case in 1 Am. & Eng. Anno. Cas. 392. In the Hornesby Case it was held that, when a street railway company voluntarily offered to passengers the right to a transfer from one of its cars to another, to continue the journey without the payment of additional fare, it was reasonable to require, as a condition precedent to the exercise of this right, that the passenger should tender to the conductor of the second car a punched transfer ticket, which must be used within the time indicated by punch marks, provided a car upon which the passenger could be conveniently and comfortably transported passed the transfer point within the time so limited. The question now before us was not directly involved in that case. Attention was then, however, called to the conflict of authority above referred to on the question now under consideration. We think that our rulings in reference to tickets issued by ordinary railway companies are more in line with those authorities that hold that the transfer slip is merely evidence of the contract, and that, if any mistake is made in issuing the transfer, so that it does not express the true contract, the conductor of the second car, on presentation of the transfer and a reasonable explanation of the mistake that appears on the slip, would at his peril decline to transport the passenger, if, as a matter of fact, a proper transfer was called for and the passenger was in no fault in reference to the matter. And we think this is the true rule. As was aptly said by Caldwell, J., in O'Rourke v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 103 Tenn. 132, 46 L.R.A. 614. 76 Am. St. Rep. 639, 52 S. W. 872: "It is the contract, and not the ticket, that gives the right to transportation. The ticket is but an evidence of the contract, made out and furnished by the carrier; and, if it fail to disclose the true contract, the fault is with the carrier, and it is responsible for the natural consequences of the variance. The passenger is not required in law, nor allowed in fact, to print, or write, or stamp the ticket. The carrier alone has that right, and the passenger is authorized to believe and presume that it will be properly exercised, and that the ticket, when delivered, is a faithful expression of the contract as made."

In the case just quoted from, there was printed on the transfer a statement requiring the passenger to examine the date, time, and direction, and see that the transfer was correct. There was also a statement that the passenger accepting the transfer agreed to "read and be bound by all the conditions on the back" of the same, "subject to the rules of the company." These conditions, so far as they required the passenger to read the transfer and examine the date, etc., were held to be unreasonable for two reasons: In the first place, the time usually occupied in making a trip on street cars was not such as to permit a compliance with the regulation; and, in the second place, if there was time for the purpose, the transfer was more or less complicated in its nature, and an inexperienced, though intelligent, passenger, who happened to be unacquainted with the system of punch marks, names of streets, etc., of the particular company, would be unable to ascertain whether it was correctly issued or not. In that case the transfer was of such a character that even an intelligent officer of the company, who testified as a witness, was unable to explain the system to the satisfaction of the trial judge. As was said by Caldwell, J., in the opinion: "It cannot be fair, or just, or reasonable, to require passengers, in the hurry of rapid street-car travel, to decipher at their peril a check, whose meaning so intelligent a judge cannot ascertain by careful and deliberate inspection." In Laird v. Pittsburgh Traction Co. 166 Pa. 4, 31 Atl. 51, a similar condition on a transfer check was under consideration, and it was said: "If that is intended to be regarded as a reasonable regulation, the check should be given to the passenger before he leaves the car a sufficient length of time to afford him at least an opportunity of reading it, and, if wrong, having it corrected." The contract between the carrier and the passenger is made by the offer held out by the company, although voluntary on its part, to transport the passenger on two lines. The transfer slip is mere evidence of the right to ride upon two lines, and, if there has been in fact a contract between the passenger and the agent of the company in charge of the first car, the right to ride upon the second car is complete, although the evidence of the right is defective. We are aware that this rule may lay the carrier open to imposition in some cases. But, on the other hand, a contrary rule would impose upon the traveling public, and especially those members of it who are inexperienced and uninformed, a serious burden, and one which it is not reasonable or proper that they should be compelled to carry. It is true that the carrier is under no obligation to make the contract, but, when it voluntarily enters into one, it is none the less a contract, and, on account of the public character of the business in which it is engaged, the courts have authority to determine whether the rules and regulations adopted by it in reference to the conduct of its business as a carrier of passengers are reasonable and proper. If what is contained in the statements on the transfer slip were embodied in an express contract, based upon a sufficient consideration, it may be that the courts would not interfere.

3. It is said that there is a condition on the transfer that, if there is any controversy in reference to the same, the holder will pay fare and call at the company's office for correction. There was a similar condition on the transfer involved in the case decided by the supreme court of Tennessee, above referred to. In reference to this stipulation the court said: "This condition is unreasonable, in that it makes the conductor, for the time, the sole judge of the sufficiency of the ticket, and requires the passenger to pay additional fare, though his ticket may be refused without sufficient cause, . . . in that it requires the wronged passenger, who so pays, to apply for refund at the office of the company; which must be remote from the houses and business places of most passengers, and then limits the amount to be received by such person to that wrongfully enacted. It puts all of the burden of the 'controversy' upon the wronged passenger, and none upon the wrongdoing company, and thereby makes the just suffer for the unjust." We thoroughly concur in this view. Counsel in their argument say that the decision of the supreme court of Tennessee which we have followed was based upon a statute of that state requiring a street railway company to issue transfers. There is no reference to a statute in the opinion of the court. In addition to this, none of the reasoning of the learned judge who delivered the opinion is based upon any statute, and the questions seemed to have been solved merely by the application of general rules of law.

4. The averments of the petition that the conductor of the second car refused to recognize the transfer and demanded payment of a second fare, and threatened to eject the plaintiff, in an insulting manner, were not sustained by the proof. The evidence, however, does show that he refused to accept the transfer, and that he demanded a second fare, and that he told the plaintiff that if she did not pay the second fare he would be compelled to eject her from the car. But the plaintiff testified that he acted in a gentlemanly manner, and that there was nothing insulting, either in his words or in his conduct, other than such an insult as may arise from a simple threat to eject. It is a case, therefore, where a conductor has simply complied with what he understood to be the rules and regulations of the company by which he was employed. In complying with these rules, although he might have had the manner of a perfect gentleman, and used language which would be proper in the most polite society, still, if the plaintiff had a right to ride upon the car and was threatened with expulsion, no matter in what words, it was a breach of the duty which the company owed her as a passenger, and gave her a right of action against the company. A jury would have been compelled to find that the explanation made by the plaintiff of the mistake in the transfer was reasonable, and, although the conductor was placed in an embarrassing position, under the law he was compelled to choose between two alternatives, and if he made a mistake, and used a threat to expel a passenger who had a right to ride on the car, the company would be liable, without reference to the manner in which he made the threat and his good faith in the matter.

5. There are some decisions which hold that the damages recoverable for an expulsion resulting from the wrongful refusal to accept a transfer, the mistake being due to the conductor of the initial car, are compensatory only. Pine v. St. Paul City R. Co. 50 Minn. 144, 16 L.R.A. 347, 52 N. W. 392; Eddy v. Syracuse Rapid Transit R. Co. 50 App. Div. 109, 63 N. Y. Supp. 645. In Ohio it was held by a circuit court that a passenger's recovery was limited to the additional fare paid, when there were no aggravating circumstances. Carr v. Toledo Traction Co. 19 Ohio C. C. 281. But we think the decision by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of Laird v. Pittsburgh Traction Co. supra, takes the better view of the matter. It was there held that in such a case the damages are not limited merely to the amount sufficient to compensate the plaintiff for the trouble and delay caused by the conductor of the company and the expense necessary to complete his journey, but he is entitled to substantial damages, as for an inexcusable trespass. In that case there was a request to instruct the jury that the damages to be recovered were simply those resulting from the trouble and inconvenience caused by the expulsion from the car. In commenting on the propriety of this instruction, Sterrett, Ch. J., well says: "To sanction such a measure of damages as is suggested in this point would tend to encourage rather than prevent the commission of indignities to which no well-behaved passenger in a public conveyance should be subjected."

6. The charge of the court was, in effect, an instruction that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. There would have been no error in instructing the jury in terms to this effect. Under the undisputed facts, a recovery was demanded, and the only question to be determined was the amount of the verdict. In the instructions on the subject of damages the court charged: "The worldly circumstances of the parties and all the attendant facts are to be weighed." This charge was assigned as error, for the reason that there was no evidence to authorize it. There was no evidence as to the worldly circumstances of the parties. While the verdict is not large, and possibly a larger verdict, as a recovery of general damages, would be permitted to stand, still the question of what should be assessed as general damages was a matter for determination by the jury, and we cannot undertake to say that the jury was not misled by the erroneous charge into giving a larger amount than they in their judgment would have thought sufficient in the absence of such an instruction.

Judgment reversed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

JOHN H. LEIPER, Plff. in Err.,
v.

CITY & COUNTY OF DENVER et al.

(— Colo. —, 85 Pac. 840.)

Highway—change of grade—damages.

A municipal corporation is not liable for injury to abutting property by alteration of the natural surface of a street in bringing it to the first established grade where the change is not unreasonable or carelessly done, even under a constitutional provision that private property shall not be damaged for public use without compensation.

(April 2, 1906.)

ERROR to the District Court for the City and County of Denver to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's property through the change of the grade of the street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Isham R. Howze, for plaintiff in error:

The Constitution does not distinguish between the first grade and subsequent ones.

Searle v. Lead, 10 S. D. 312, 39 L.R.A. 345, compensation. The court did not discuss the distinction between the original grading of the street and a subsequent change of a grade already established, and there is nothing in the opinion to show that the street had been previously graded.

But in Ft. Worth v. Howard, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 537, 22 S. W. 1059, the question is clearly presented, and the court held the abutting owner entitled to recover for damages resulting from the original grading of the street, and stated that the rule rested upon "the broad principle of equity, now embodied in the Constitution itself, that the public should make good the loss to the individual where private property is damaged for the public benefit." The highway involved in this case had been in existence for several years prior to the grading, during which time two or three dwellings had been erected by the plaintiff.

And in Texarkana v. Talbot, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 202, 26 S. W. 451, the court recognized the abutting owner's right to recover for damages resulting from the original grading of the street, and cited both the Dallas and Ft. Worth Cases but held against the plaintiff upon the ground that, by signing the petition for the improvement of the street, he had consented to the same within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution making the right to compensation depend on the want of consent of the person injured.

Under the South Dakota Constitution declaring that private property shall not be taken for police use, or damaged, without compensation, the court, in Searle v. Lead, 10 S. D. 312, 39 L.R.A. 345, 73 N. W. 101, restrained the grading of the street, which had not previously been graded, until the plaintiff's damages had been ascertained and paid. The plaintiff had erected a house upon her lot in accordance with the natural grade of the street. The municipality contended that it was not liable for an incidental injury caused by the making of a grade for the first time, but that the liability was limited to those cases in which a grade which had been previously established was changed, and cited the statute of South Dakota, declaring a municipality liable for damages resulting from the changing of a grade which had been previously established. To this the court said that the act of the legislature could not abridge or control the provisions of the Constitution, and that the provisions of the Constitution were self-executing, general in their language, and not limited to change of grade previously established.

This ruling was adhered to in Whittaker v. Deadwood, 12 S. D. 606, 82 N. W. 202, where the plaintiff had erected buildings conforming to the grade which had been previously established under what the trial court found to be an invalid ordinance. But the court held this finding immaterial as the plaintiff was entitled to recover even though the grade had not been previously established.

In Werth v. Springfield, 78 Mo. 107, the court, in holding an abutting owner entitled to recover for damages caused by changing the grade of the street, under the Missouri Constitution forbidding the taking or damaging of private property for public use without compensation said: "When property is damaged by establishing the grade of a street, or by raising or lowering the grade of a street previously established, it is damaged for public use within the meaning of the Constitution." The report of the case does not show whether the grade of the street involved had been previously established, though it does show that the highway had been in existence for some time previous to the grading complained of.

In another Missouri case in which a similar decision was rendered, and where the highway had been in existence for some time, it does not clearly appear whether the street had been previously graded, though the opinion conveys the impression that it had not been so graded; and the court quoted from the Werth Case the language above referred to. McElroy v. Kansas City, 21 Fed. 257.

Messrs. H. A. Lindsley and H. L. Ritter, for defendants in error:

Plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

Denver v. Bonesteel, 30 Colo. 107, 69 Pac. 595.

Campbell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question for decision is whether

The right to recover for damages arising from the grading of a street which had never been previously graded was squarely raised in Eachus v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. 103 Cal. 614, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149, 37 Pac. 750. Plaintiff was permitted to recover under the provisions of the California Constitution forbidding the taking or damaging of private property for public use without compensation. In this case it was admitted that the street had never been changed from its natural grade until the excavations were made by the defendant in the construction of its railroad, although it had been in existence for twenty years, and the plaintiff had erected a house on the adjoining lot, and the court said: "The same rule is applicable when a street is for the first time reduced to an established grade, as when a change in the grade has been made after the street has once been brought to such grade."

In Eachus v. Los Angeles, 130 Cal. 492, 80 Am. St. Rep. 147, 62 Pac. 829, the defendant municipality was held liable for the establishment and enforcement of a grade of the highway in front of the plaintiff's lots, under the provisions of the California Constitution.

The question here discussed has been passed upon under the Illinois Constitution declaring that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, and the liability of the defendant sustained. Elgin v. Eaton, 83 Ill. 535, 25 Am. Rep. 412; Bloomington v. Pollock, 141 Ill. 346, 31 N. E. 146. In the Bloomington Case the grading of the highway was fixed by an ordinance adopted in 1860, but no attempt had been made to carry it into effect until 1889. In 1858, two years prior to the adoption of the ordinance, a house had been constructed on the abutting lot, which the plaintiff purchased in 1878. The constitutional provision requiring compensation for property damaged for public use was not adopted until after the ordinance fixing the grade complained of, although prior to its execution. In holding a municipality liable a municipality is liable to an abutting lot owner for damages resulting thereto from the authorized lowering or raising of the grade of a public street from the natural surface to a grade established by municipal ordinance in the first instance, notwithstanding the fact that the change is reasonable and the work of making the same is skilfully performed. In Denver v. Bonesteel, 30 Colo. 107, 69 Pac. 595, § 15 of article 2 of our Constitution, which is here invoked as creating such liability, was considered at some length. It was there held that, under this provision, which declares that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public or private use without just compensation, where a permanent grade of a street is established by a city, and an abutting lot owner improves his for damages arising from the grading of a street, even though it be the original grading, the court made no comment on the fact that the ordinance fixing the grade complained of was adopted prior to the plaintiff's purchase of the house, and no attempt was made to make a point of this fact. The fact that the ordinance was adopted prior to the constitutional amendment referred to was discussed, but it was held that that did not relieve the defendant from liability, as "the matter of the liability or nonliability for injury that might or might not thereafter be occasioned by bringing the street to the grade so established was and is a matter wholly dehors the ordinance itself, and the question of such immunity or liability depends exclusively upon the mandate of the law which is in force at the time the grading is in fact done."

And in Montana it has been held, under a similar constitutional provision, that the abutting owner is entitled to compensation for the damages here discussed, notwithstanding the fact that the grade complained of is the first one established. Less v. Butte, 28 Mont. 27, 61 L.R.A. 601, 98 Am. St. Rep. 545, 72 Pac. 140. The fact that the grade involved was the original grade was raised by the defendant municipality as a ground for immunity from liability, and such defense disapproved by the court in the following statement: "The first grade of Broadway street was that provided by nature, and the alteration made by appellant was as much a change of grade as if the change had been made from a grade previously established by the authorities." This highway, which had been in existence for several years, was dedicated to the city as a street upon the annexation to the city of the adjoining territory, at which time the plaintiff erected a house. Subsequently the city established the grade complained of.

In New Brighton v. United Presby. Church, 96 Pa. 331, it was held that an abutting owner whose property has been injured by a change of the grade of a street from property in conformity thereto, the city is liable in damages to such property occasioned by a subsequent change of the grade of the street. In prior decisions of this court, referred to in the opinion, the same clause of the Constitution was the subject of careful consideration. While in the various cases the precise question now presented was not expressly determined, the court, as then constituted, made several observations, which were strictly germane to the exact point decided, that indicated its disapproval of the principle now invoked by the plaintiff. It is true that in some of the cases from other states cited in the Bone-steel opinion it was ruled that the municipality is liable to an abutting owner for consequential damages caused by a reduction from the natural surface to a grade established in the first instance, as well as from one authorized grade to another. In other cases the doctrine is applied only in the latter contingency. This diversity in the holdings was expressly referred to at page 111 of 30 Colo., and page 597 of 69 Pac. Such reference, however, was not intended as a final or definite expression of our approval of the former doctrine, or rejection of the latter. Yet that opinion shows that not only is there nothing in any of our own previous cases inconsistent with the conclusion then reached, but all such antecedent expressions of opinion were regarded as consistent with the distinction drawn by Judge Dillon, in his valuable work on Municipal Corporations, 4th ed. vol. 2, § 995b, which was then clearly indicated as the basis of the decision, and as foreshadowing the natural grade may recover damages to the same extent as though the change had been made from a grade previously established by the proper authorities. This was followed in Hendrick's Appeal, 103 Pa. 358. These decisions were rendered pursuant to a statute requiring compensation to the abutting owners for damages caused by the changing of the grade of a street, which statute was passed for the purpose of giving effect to the provision in the Pennsylvania Constitution declaring that municipal and other corporations invested with the power of eminent domain shall make compensation "for property taken, injured, or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of their works, highways, or improvements."

And in O'Brien v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. 589, 30 Am. St. Rep. 832, 24 Atl. 1047, the abutting owner was allowed to recover against the city for injuries resulting in a change of the existing grade of an old and open public highway, although such grading was the first that the highway had received.

Under the Nebraska Constitution containing a provision against taking or damaging private property for public use without just compensation, a municipality is liable to an abutting owner, who erected buildings before the grade of the highway was established, for damages sustained by him by the subsequent raising of the street in front of his property. Harmon v. Omaha, 17 Neb. 548, 52 Am. Rep. 420, 23 N. W. 503.

Existence and use of highway prior to establishment of grade.

It is deemed desirable to call attention to the fact that in each of the above cases the proceedings to establish the grade were separate from the proceedings to lay out the highway, so that the highway was actually in existence for a time prior to the establishment of the grade.

No suggestion was made in any of the cases that a different result might be reached in a case where the laying out of the highway and the establishment of the grade were closely related in point of time, or where they in fact were accomplished in a single proceeding, though, of course, in the latter case an action to recover damages for the grading might well be subjected to the defense of res judicata where there had been a previous proceeding to assess damages, though only the damages for the taking had been assessed.

Thus, in Massachusetts and New Jersey, where the statutes expressly require payment for damages arising from the grading of streets, the courts have been called upon to determine the right of the abutting owner, who has failed to have the damages for the grading assessed in the proceedings determining the amount of his compensation for the taking of the land, to institute a second proceeding for the recovery of such damages; and it seems to turn upon whether or not the proceedings to construct the road were separate from those relating to the grading of the highway.

In Van Riper v. Essex Public Road Board, 38 N. J. L. 23, where land had been taken for the widening of a highway and the commissioners had appraised the complainant's damages for the taking of the property, and where subsequently it was decided to alter the grade of the street, it was held that, such proceedings being separate, the plaintiff was not prevented by the first assessment of damages from having a second assessment for the purpose of fixing his damages resulting from the grading.

In a similar case in Massachusetts damages were assessed for the widening of a street the grading of which was fixed by a subsequent proceeding, and it was held that the damages for the grading were not contemplated in the original widening, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Lane v. Boston, 125 Mass. 519.

In Snow v. Provincetown, 109 Mass. 123, the town widened a street, and damages were assessed and paid for the same, and two years later the town voted to grade and pave the street. It was held that the proceedings were entirely independent of each our present conclusion, namely, that municipal liability in these cases should be limited to changes in established grades, and is not to be extended to reductions from the natural surface, except when the change is unreasonable or carelessly made.

It must be conceded that in Illinois, from which our constitutional provision is borrowed, and in the majority of the other states that have adopted similar clauses, a municipality is held liable for consequential damages resulting from changes in the grade of the street, whether made for the first time or for a change from one established grade to another. However, we are now constrained to hold that for reasonable and carefully made changes of the grade of a public street from the natural surface to a legally established grade in the first instance a municipality is not liable to the abutting lot owner for consequential damages to his property. We are led to this conclusion not only because of the strong reasons advanced by Judge Dillon, supra, but also because of our former decisions, which, in view of the general understanding of the profession as to the doctrine they announce, should be regarded as stare decisis. Judge Dillon, at § 995a, in stating what the abutting lot owner, who builds with reference to the natural surface, in law is bound to contemplate with respect to the power of the municipality in changing the grade of streets, says: "In view of these considerations, it seems to us clear that for the original establishment of a grade line and the reduction of the natural surface of the street for street purposes to such line there is no legal right, or even natural equity, in the dedicant or his assignee to compensation." He further says: "But where a grade has been officially established, and particularly where improvements have been thereafter made according to such established grade, and it is afterwards changed to the injury of the abutting owners, there is a strong natural equity in their favor for compensation. . . . For the reasons above suggested, it seems to us that, on principle, the mere provision of the Constitution imposing a liability for property damaged for public use does not create a liability on the part of the municipality for reducing the natural surface of the street, in the course of its normal and ordinary improvement for street purposes proper, to a grade line for the first time established. If there are cases to the contrary, we doubt whether they were well considered, and think that they are not well decided. . . . Although sensible of the apparent difficulty of defining the grounds for the distinction, it seems to us, where a grade line has been officially established, and where other, and the abutting owner was entitled to institute a second proceeding to recover damages for the grading. In rendering its decision, the court, in referring to the measure of damages, used language indicating that the abutting owner could not recover in the second proceeding damages which would necessarily arise in carrying out the original construction of the highway, as it said, in speaking of the original assessment of damages: "These damages no doubt included compensation for changes in the surface of the street injurious to the owners, and which were contemplated as necessary in its original construction. But this did not prevent the town from changing the original grade at any time thereafter for the purpose of improving or repairing the way. The question for the jury, in case of such change, would be, how much additional damage for that act the landowner ought to receive; in other words, how much of the change from the original surface was due to original construction and how much to subsequent improvement of the street."

Where the grading of a street is a part of the original laying out and construction of the highway, a proceeding to assess damages must be brought under the statute providing for damages occasioned by the laying out of the highway, and not under the statute providing for compensation for the raising or lowering of a highway, as the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

latter statute presupposes the existence of a highway, the damages for the laying out of which have once been paid, and not a case where the grading is a part of the original construction. And he is entitled to recover in the one proceeding all the damages arising out of the laying out, construction, and grading of the highway. This latter statement is a dictum, as the only question actually involved was whether the proceedings had been brought under the proper statute. Geraghty v. Boston, 120 Mass. 416.

Erection of improvements in reliance on natural grade.

The decisions upon the question here annotated have all been placed upon the broad ground that the injuries inflicted upon adjoining property by the grading of a highway, whether it be the initial grading or a subsequent change in the grade, constitute a damage within the meaning of the constitutional provision against damaging private property for public use without compensation, and in no case has the fact that improvements had been erected in conformity to the natural grade been referred to as a ground of liability, and no attempt has been made to distinguish the cases in which no improvements had been made. The liability was sustained in both classes of cases and on the same ground.

property has been improved on the faith of it (which is, of course, done on the assumption that the grade is permanent, although the power to change it for the public good exists), that such a case rests upon so strong a basis of natural justice as to bring it within the purpose of the constitutional provision in question. . . . The decisions under the amended constitutional provision upon the exact point, as to its effect on street grade cases, are not as yet very numerous, but some of those referred to in the note to the next section appear to give this provision a scope greater than the one here suggested."

Counsel for plaintiff in error, however, says that these observations of Judge Dillon were made in 1890, and after that time a number of cases by the courts of the states where this constitutional provision is in force have ignored his distinction and held that municipal liability is created whenever consequential damages to the abutting owner result from any change whatever in the grade of a street. A leading case so holding is Less v. Butte, 28 Mont. 27, 61 L.R.A. 601, 98 Am. St. Rep. 545, 72 Pac. 140, in which the later cases are cited. It is true, as already stated, that the majority of cases support the contention of plaintiff in error, and possibly in only the states of Georgia, Mississippi, and Colorado has the qualified doctrine apparently been announced. Notwithstanding the number of cases to the contrary, we are still convinced of the soundness of the views of Judge Dillon, and our previous decisions are in harmony with this conclusion. This is apparent from the following excerpts taken from several of its opinions:

The leading case is Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 Pac. 6. The precise question there determined was that, for consequential damages to a lot abutting on a street over which the city by ordinance had granted to a railroad company the right to build a railroad track, the railroad company, and not the city, was liable. In the course of the carefully considered opinion by Helm, Justice, in discussing consequential damages in such cases, it was said: "But sometimes these interferences and resulting injury may properly, even in this state, be held to be damnum absque injuria, as where they are occasioned by a reasonable improvement of the street by the proper authority for the greater convenience of the public." And in speaking of the power of the city over its streets the judge said: "In determining what changes and improvements are most conducive to this end, the council exercises a large discretion. And unless unreasonable changes are made, or injury results to the adjoining premises through the unskillfulness or negligence of those employed, the owner thereof will not be heard to complain, though in fact the real value and convenience of his property are diminished thereby; for in purchasing his lot, or in relinquishing the public easement, he is conclusively presumed to have contemplated this power and authority of the municipal government, and is held to have anticipated any injury to his abutting land resulting from a reasonable and proper exercise thereof." The following remark is quite pertinent: "The abutting owner may well be presumed to have taken into consideration the fact that the grade of the street might be raised or lowered, that pavements might be laid and bridges and culverts constructed, and that a street railroad even might be built and operated thereon; and it may fairly be presumed that in purchasing he anticipated and allowed for the possible or probable damages to result from these and similar changes, or that he signified his consent thereto, and thus deprived himself of any right to compensation therefor." And in referring to the fact that some of the decisions under this constitutional provision would establish the liability of the city in a case like that under consideration, and in summing up the doctrine upon the point, the learned judge concludes: "As will be observed, we do not go so far as some of these cases. That our position might not be misunderstood, we have, at the risk of being charged with obiter dictum, suggested that, as at present advised, we think that for injuries caused by a reasonable change or improvement of the street by the council in a careful manner the abutting owner should not recover."

In Denver v. Vernia, 8 Colo. 399, 404, 8 Pac. 656, the Bayer Case was approved, and the concluding observation of Judge Helm, which we have just quoted, was by Chief Justice Beck said to be a correct legal proposition. The concurring opinion of Judge Dickey in Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 83, in which the following language was used, was also referred to with approval: "It is not every change of grade made in a street, which may in effect impair the value of the lot in its vicinity, which is a violation of the right of the proprietor thereof. Such changes in the street as it may reasonably be supposed might be made for the improvement of the public highway, the purchaser of a lot upon a street must be assumed to have consented to when the purchase was made. The making of such changes is, therefore, no invasion of his right in that regard." One of the elements of damages claimed by the plaintiff against the city in the Vernia Case was for the fixing of the grade of a street in the first instance 3 feet below the natural surface of plaintiff's lots; and the court held that that was not an element upon which he was entitled to recover.

In Denver Circle R. Co. v. Nestor, 10 Colo. 403, 15 Pac. 714, Judge Helm, in his concurring opinion, refers to the Bayer and Vernia Cases, supra, and says with reference to the constitutional provision here under consideration that the abutting lot owner was bound to anticipate, in making his purchase, that the street would necessarily be occupied by the local public for all the usual and ordinary purposes of a highway, and that the city would from time to time so change and improve the street as to render it more convenient for such purposes, and that indirect injuries resulting to him therefrom remain now, as they existed before the constitutional provision was adopted, wrongs without a legal remedy.

In Durango v. Luttrell, 18 Colo. 123, 31 Pac. 853, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Elliott, the doctrine was recognized that, for a reasonable improvement of the street by the authority of the city in bringing it to a legally established grade, no liability for consequential damages to an abutting lot owner resulted.

In Gilbert v. Greeley, S. L. & P. R. Co. 13 Colo. 501, 22 Pac. 814, the court remarked that it was not proper to say, notwithstanding the broad terms of our Constitution and the unqualified expressions of certain judicial opinions elsewhere, that, whenever a depreciation of private property is caused by some public improvement, the owner of the property thus depreciated may recover compensation against the party making the improvement; and again the previous cases, cited above, were referred to with approval.

In Pueblo v. Strait, 20 Colo. 13, 24 L.R.A. 392, 46 Am. St. Rep. 273, 36 Pac. 789, Mr. Chief Justice Hayt, in summarizing the doctrine of these cases, says: "For injuries resulting from reasonable and ordinary or usual change and improvement of the street by the municipality the abutting owner cannot recover, provided the change or improvement is made in a careful and skilful manner for the benefit of the public." And in referring to the interpretation put upon similar clauses of the Constitution of Illinois and other states, where a recovery is allowed in all cases where private property sustains substantial damage by the making of a public improvement, he recognizes that in Colorado such interpretation has not been followed, and says that in this state "the right of recovery has been limited to those unusual uses to which but few streets are subjected."

As well said by Judge Dillon, while sensible of the apparent difficulty of defining the grounds for the distinction, we regard it as almost, if not quite, stare decisis in this jurisdiction, that, for the raising or lowering of the grade of a street by a municipality from the natural surface to the grade established in the first instance, the municipality is not liable to the abutting lot owner for consequential damages to his property, unless the change of grade is unreasonable or has been negligently made.

The judgment of the District Court, being in line with our conclusion, is affirmed.

COLUMBIA NATIONAL SAND DREDGING COMPANY et al., Appts.,

v.

GEORGE B. MORTON et al.

(— App. D. C. —)

Equity—injunction—foreign lands.

1. Equity has no jurisdiction to restrain acts of trespass on lands in another state where the principal fact involved and upon which the right to exercise the restraint depends is that of title to the land, even though the necessary parties are properly before it.

On motion to reform.

Appeal—costs—division.

2. Each party may be required to pay his own costs on reversal of a decree for want of jurisdiction in the trial court, where defendant did not question the jurisdiction, but proceeded to try the case on its merits.

(November 7, 1906.)

Case Note.—Jurisdiction to enjoin acts with respect to real property in another state: — In a note in 69 L.R.A. 673, upon the general subject of the jurisdiction of equity over suits affecting foreign real property, it was stated, as a qualification of the general rule which upholds the jurisdiction when the parties are personally within the jurisdiction and effective relief may be granted by a decree in personam, that a court of one state or country will not assume jurisdiction of a suit that in its essentials involves merely the title or possession of land in another, and presents no ground of equitable intervention. The decision in the foregoing case seems to fall within that exception, and, since it is at least doubtful whether, upon the state of facts presented in this case, a court of equity would, before the establishment of title by an action at APPPEAL of defendants from a decree of the Supreme Court enjoining defendants from interfering with certain sand and gravel alleged to belong to complainants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. K. McCammon and James H. Hayden for appellants.

Messrs. Enoch Harlan, G. E. Hamilton, M. J. Colbert, and J. J. Hamilton for appellees.

Shepard, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree perpetuating an injunction against acts of continued trespass upon land. George B. Morton, a resident and citizen of Prince George's county, Maryland, and the Potomac Dredging Company, of Baltimore, a corporation of the state of Maryland, filed their bill against the Columbia National Sand Dredging Company, a corporation of the state of Virginia, maintaining an office in the District of Columbia, and against Lewis E. Smoot, a resident of said District. The bill alleges that George B. Morton is owner in fee simple of a certain tract of land known as Auburn, located on the southern side of Piscataway creek, in Prince George's county, Maryland, and is entitled to the bed of said creek to the head of the stream, which forms the northern boundary thereof for a long distance, as appears from the original deed conveying said property to him, which is made an exhibit to the bill. That some distance from law, entertain a suit to enjoin a trespass, even with respect to land within the territorial jurisdiction (2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 502), the case also seems to fall within the more specific statement in that note, to the effect that, if the action is one which, if it related to real property within the territorial jurisdiction, would be at law and not in equity, a court of equity will not assume jurisdiction merely because, the property being beyond the territorial jurisdiction, a court of law could not entertain an action in respect of it.

Although, as subsequently shown, jurisdiction to restrain acts with respect to foreign lands has not infrequently been upheld, it has been denied in a number of cases upon the grounds suggested in the foregoing statements of the exception to the general rule as to equity jurisdiction over suits affecting foreign real property, and for reasons quite similar to those upon which the decision in the above-reported case rests.

Thus, it was held in Chase v. Knickerbocker Phosphate Co. 32 App. Div. 400, 53 N. Y. Supp. 220, that a court will not entertain jurisdiction where the naked question of title is involved, or a mere trespass or nuisance on extraterritorial real property is sought to be restrained.

And in Genet v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 13 Misc. 409, 35 N. Y. Supp. 147, the court said that equity acts in personam when the parties are within the jurisdiction of the court, though the lands affected are within another state, but not to the extent of awarding relief more appropriately obtainable in a common-law action of ejectment, triable by a jury of the vicinage.

So, the court, in Thomas v. Hukill. 131 Pa. 298, 18 Atl. 875, in denying the jurisdiction of a suit to restrain further operations under a lease of oil lands in another state, said that, while the proceeding was in form a bill in equity, it was in substance a possessory action involving the title to real estate.

the jurisdiction of a Federal court sitting in Indiana of a suit by an Indiana corporation to enjoin defendant from constructing a road in Indiana upon the ground that complainant had the exclusive right, said no action of ejectment or for trespass on real property—which concededly would be local—could have a more decidedly local character than the appropriate remedies for the injuries complained of, and that such character was not changed by a bill in chancery.

Courts of equity, however, having personal jurisdiction of the necessary parties, have assumed jurisdiction to restrain the commission of acts injurious to real property in another state.—Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Worster, 23 N. H. 462; to enjoin interference with a right of way over land in another state,—Alexander v. Tolleston Club, 110 Ill. 65; to enjoin the conveyance of land in another state to third persons by the grantor in a deed which is sufficient to pass the legal title, but so defectively acknowledged that it cannot be so recorded as to charge third persons with constructive notice,—Frank v. Peyton, 82 Ky. 150; to restrain defendant from interfering with complainant's possession of land in another state pending a suit to establish complainant's title,—Kirklin v. Atlas Sav. & L. Assn. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 60 S. W. 149; to restrain a judgment debtor and his mortgagee from transferring or assigning any interest in land in another state,—Kirdahi v. Basha, 36 Misc. 715, 74 N. Y. Supp. 383.

So, courts of equity having jurisdiction of the persons of the parties have in some instances enjoined legal proceedings with respect to real property located in other states or countries. Bunbury v. Bunbury, 1 Beav. 318; Beckford v. Kemble, 1 Sim. & Stu. 7; Hope v. Carnegie, L. R. 1 Ch. 320. So, in Bowers v. Durant, 43 Hun, 348, jurisdiction was upheld to restrain partition suits brought in other states for the partition of lands in those states, in violation of defendant's agreement that a suit for that purpose might be brought in New York.

And Gibson v. American Loan & T. Co. 58 Hun, 443, 12 N. Y. Supp. 444, held that the shore, but well south of the thread of the creek, is a sand and gravel bar, attached at places to said shore, and short distances beyond this are other deposits of sand and gravel, which, by reason of the formation of the shore line, are gradually added to and form accretions to said shore, and all of which belong to said Morton. That for a valuable consideration said Morton had granted to the Potomac Dredging Company the exclusive privilege until May 1, 1909, of taking away said sand and gravel from said shore, and the said bar in front of said shore, and from the gravel flats attached thereto. That the said company made a channel up said creek, into said bar, and made it possible to come in contact with the said deposits of sand and gravel attached to and forming part of the said shore. That this sand and gravel is valuable for building purposes, and the said company can and does sell the same profitably in the District of Columbia, paying the said Gorge B. Morton a fair sum for the privilege of taking the same. That after the said company had, at great expense, made the channel for its use and benefit, the defendant corporation brought one of its dredging plants up said channel and took large quantities of sand and gravel from the bar heretofore referred to as belonging to complainant, and continued same until complainant replevied some scow loads so taken, which they were able to follow, though with much trouble. That within a few days past one of the dredging plants belonging to the defendant Smoot moved into the same position at the direction of defendants, and is now engaged in taking large and valuable quantities of sand and gravel heretofore referred to as belonging to complainants, though complainants have requested and warned them to desist. That the damage such wrongful taking has caused and will continue to cause complainants, though amounting to many hundreds of dollars, is not susceptible of accurate, or even approximate, measurement, so as to make it possible for them to obtain adequate compensation in damages for the wrongful taking thereof, and will necessitate the institution of a large number of suits; and, inasmuch as the damage is irreparable, and the quantities taken are so extremely difficult, if not impossible, to approximate, and it is impracticable to follow and replevin the property taken and carried away, complainants aver that they should have an injunction to restrain the further taking of sand and gravel from the premises aforesaid.

The restraining order was granted, and on June 16, 1905, the defendants filed a joint answer in which they denied that the said Morton is entitled to any part of the bed of the said creek, and alleged that the northerly boundary line of his land is the high-water mark on the southerly margin of said creek, as appears from two deeds recorded among the land records of Prince George's county, whereunder the said Morton and his predecessors in title derived and obtained a court of New York had jurisdiction to restrain a trust company from proceeding with a suit in another state to foreclose a mortgage upon real property in the latter state, pending the determination of an action in New York for the removal of the trustee upon the ground of bad faith in the prosecution of the action.

And in Ft. Wayne Trust Co. v. Sihler, 34 Ind. App. 140, 72 N. E. 494, it was held that a court of Indiana had power to declare a note, and mortgage securing the same, void because executed by a married woman as security for a debt of her husband, and to enjoin defendant from attempting to enforce either the note or mortgage, although the mortgaged land lay in another state.

But a court of equity of one state will not enjoin the foreclosure of a mortgage upon real property in another, merely because the courts of the situs entertain different views of the law as to the rights of the parties from those entertained by the courts of the state in which the injunction is sought, and by the United States Supreme Court. Carson v. Dunham, 149 Mass. 52, 3 L.R.A. 203, 14 Am. St. Rep. 397, 20 N. E. 312.

In Schindelholz v. Cullum, 5 C. C. A. 293, 12 U. S. App. 242, 55 Fed. 885, the jurisdiction was denied upon the ground that the person whose rights were to be affected was not a party.

And in the following cases an injunction to restrain legal proceedings with respect to land in another jurisdiction was denied as a matter of discretion or upon the merits, and not upon the ground of an entire lack of jurisdiction: Moor v. Anglo-Italian Bank, L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 681; White v. Hall, 12 Ves. Jr. 321; Jones v. Geddes, 1 Phill. Ch. 724; Norton v. Florence Land & Public Works, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 332; Durant v. Pierson, 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 203, 12 N. Y. Supp. 145; Harris v. Pullman, 84 Ill. 20, 25 Am. Rep. 415; Mead v. Merritt, 2 Paige, 402; Mariposa Co. v. Garrison, 26 How. Pr. 448. It is, of course, an indispensable prerequisite to jurisdiction of a suit affecting foreign real property that all the necessary parties shall be subject personally to the jurisdiction of the court, and also that the case shall be one in which effective relief may be granted by a decree in personam. But, as shown by the case above reported and by cases cited in this note, the existence of both these conditions will not confer jurisdiction if the action in its essence involves merely the legal title or possession of the land, so that it is essentially a local, and not a transitory, action.

any and all right, title, or interest which they or any one of them has or had in and to the land referred to in the bill. Copies of said deed and a plat of the land referred to are attached and made an exhibit. The defendants further answered that the said creek is a navigable water of the United States, and a public river of the state of Maryland, and that the entire right and title to the bed thereof is in the state of Maryland, and not in the complainants, or either of them, as alleged; and they further denied that the sand and gravel bar described constitutes an accretion appurtenant to any land owned by the complainant Morton, and aver that he has no right or title to the same. They admit the taking of sand and gravel from the bar aforesaid under a written permit and grant to defendants by the Secretary of War of the United States on April 14, 1903, the same being attached and made an exhibit to the answer. They further aver that the complainants instituted criminal proceedings against them under an act of Maryland of March 3, 1900, providing that persons wilfully trespassing upon the lands of others should be subjected to fine or imprisonment, and caused agents and employees of defendant to be arrested and placed in jail in the state of Maryland, from which they were released on writs of habeas corpus issued out of the circuit court of Prince George's county, Maryland. They further aver that complainants brought a suit in equity against defendants in the circuit court of Prince George's county, Maryland, on or about June 9, 1905, making substantially the same allegations and asking the same relief as in this bill, but that the same was dismissed by complainants on June 13, 1905, for the reason that the said court had declined to grant the preliminary injunction forbidding the defendants from dredging, taking, or removing sand and gravel from the sand and gravel bar hereinbefore mentioned. Upon this answer they moved to dissolve the restraining order, but the same was overruled and continued in force until final decree.

Testimony was then taken, and resulted in a final decree entered April 13, 1906, sustaining the bill and perpetually enjoining the defendants from taking and removing by dredge or otherwise sand and gravel or other materials from the bar or deposit of sand and gravel attached to the shore or in front thereof, and extending into and towards the center of Piscataway creek in the state of Maryland, in front of and bounding on the farm known as Auburn, in Prince George's county, in said state, belonging to George B. Morton.

otherwise to the jurisdiction of the court in the premises, and the same was assumed and maintained without consideration. The appeal is from the decree on its merits.

When this case was called for hearing on appeal no suggestion of want of jurisdiction was made by the appellants, but the court, of its own motion, declined to hear argument on the merits of the questions involved, until satisfied that the court below had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the bill; and argument was required on the point. The submission was on that question and none other.

It is plain from the allegations of the bill and answer that the necessary questions to be determined in the suit is whether George B. Morton has title to the sand and gravel bar, lying wholly within the state of Maryland, either by deed conveying the title to the middle line of Piscataway creek, or, in case the boundary of the land conveyed thereby shall be confined to the shore of said creek, as an accretion to his land upon the shore. This is not only the principal, but substantially the only, question involved.

It is to the principal question involved in any case that we look to determine whether the action be local or transitory in its nature. If the principal fact carry with it the idea of some certain place, for example, relates to land, it is local, and the action must be maintained in the place where it is situated. If an action had been brought at law for a trespass upon the land in question in removing sand and gravel therefrom, the supreme court of the District would clearly have had no jurisdiction. Ellenwood v. Marietta Chair Co. 158 U. S. 105, 39 L. ed. 913, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 771. In that case an action was brought in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Ohio, alleging continued acts of trespass upon the land of plaintiff in the state of West Virginia, as well as the cutting and removing therefrom of large quantities of timber. No question of the jurisdiction was made by the defendant, but the court of its own motion ordered the case stricken from the docket for want of jurisdiction. In affirming that judgment, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Gray, said: "By the law of England, and of those states of the Union whose jurisprudence is based upon the common law, an action for trespass upon land, like an action to recover the title or the possession of the land itself, is a local action, and can only be brought within the state in which the land lies. . . . The original petition contained two counts, the one for trespass upon land, and the other for taking away and converting to the defendant's use personal property; and the cause of action stated in the second count might have been considered as transitory, although the first was not. . . . But the petition, as amended by the plaintiff, on motion of the defendant, and by order and leave of the court, contained a single count, alleging a continuing trespass upon the land by the defendant, . . . and its cutting and conversion of timber grown thereon. This allegation was of a single cause of action, in which the trespass upon the land was the principal thing, and the conversion of the timber was incidental only, and could not, therefore, be maintained by proof of the conversion of personal property, without also proving the trespass upon real estate. Cotton v. United States, 11 How. 229, 13 L. ed. 675; Eames v. Prentice, 8 Cush. 337; Howe v. Wilson, 1 Denio, 181; Dodge v. Colby, 108 N. Y. 445, 15 N. E. 703; Merriman v. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. 86 Wis. 142, 56 N. W. 743. The entire cause of action was local. The land alleged to have been trespassed upon being in West Virginia, the action could not be maintained in Ohio."

The contention that the doctrine of this case is impaired by the later case of Stone v. United States, 167 U. S. 178, 182, 42 L. ed. 127, 129, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 778, is untenable. As we have seen, it was said in the former case that, if the cause of action had been confined to the recovery of timber removed from the land, the action might have been considered as transitory. In the Stone Case the action was to recover the reasonable value of lumber and railroad ties manufactured from trees alleged to have been unlawfully cut by the defendant Stone from certain lands in Idaho belonging to the United States. The jurisdiction of the district court of the United States for the state of Washington, in which the suit was brought, was affirmed. Referring to the case of Ellenwood v. Marietta Chair Co. supra, Mr. Justice Harlan said: "But that case proceeded upon the theory that the allegations of the petition, at the time it was tried, presented a single cause of action, in which the trespass upon the land was the principal thing, and the conversion of the property was incidental only; and, therefore, that the entire cause of action was local. In the present case the petition, it is true, avers that the United States was the owner of the lands from which the trees were cut, but the gravamen of the action was the conversion of the lumber and the railroad ties manufactured out of such trees, and a judgment was asked, not for the trespass, but for the value of the personal property so converted by the defendant. The description in the petition of the lands and the averment of ownership in the United States were intended to show the right of the government to claim the value of the personal property manufactured from the trees illegally taken from its lands. Although the government's denial of the ownership of the land made it necessary for . . . [the government] to prove its ownership, the action in its essential features related to personal property, was of a transitory nature, and could be brought in any jurisdiction in which the defendant could be found and served with process. And a suit could have been brought to recover the property wherever it could be found. In Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Wall. 44, 64, 22 L. ed. 551, 555, it was said: 'The title to the land remaining in the state, the lumber cut upon the land belonged to the state. Whilst the timber was standing it constituted a part of the realty; being severed from the soil its character was changed; it became personalty, but its title was not affected; it continued as previously the property of the owner of the land, and could be pursued wherever it was carried. All the remedies were open to the owner which the law affords in other cases of the wrongful removal or conversion of personal property.'"

The distinction between the two cases is thus clearly defined. It follows, therefore, that an action for trespass upon the land, involving necessarily and chiefly the question of its title, is local, and could only be brought in the jurisdiction wherein the land is situated; on the other hand, an action to recover the value of the sand and gravel severed from the land and removed therefrom, though incidentally made to involve the question of title, could be maintained in the District of Columbia against parties found therein and personally served with process.

It is contended, however, that, because the equity jurisdiction is rightfully invoked to restrain acts of continuing trespass upon the land working injuries irreparable at law, as well as to prevent a multiplicity of suits, the difficulty with the action of trespass at law is obviated by reason of the principle that equity acts in personam, and not in rem. In other words, that the court of equity in this District, having jurisdiction of the persons of the defendants, may restrain them from committing acts of trespass upon lands in Maryland notwithstanding the principal fact involved, and upon which the right to exercise the restraint depends, is that of title to the land. We cannot agree with this contention. From a very early period courts of equity, having jurisdiction of the person of a party, have exercised the power to compel him to perform a contract, execute a trust, or undo the effects of a fraud, notwithstanding it may relate to, or incidentally affect, the title to land in another jurisdiction. The doctrine is thoroughly well established within this limitation, that the principal question involved must be one of contract, trust, or fraud, raising up a duty which a person within the power of the court may be compelled to perform, although the act when performed may operate to affect, and even to pass, the title to land outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court. As was said by Mr. Justice Field in Pennoy v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 723, 24 L. ed. 565, 569: "Thus the state, through its tribunals, may compel persons domiciled within its limits to execute, in pursuance of their contracts respecting property elsewhere situated, instruments in such form and with such solemnities as to transfer the title, so far as such formalities can be complied with; and the exercise of this jurisdiction in no manner interferes with the supreme control over the property by the state within which it is situated. Penn v. Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sr. 444; Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 148, 3 L. ed. 181; Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 25, 10 L. ed. 873; Corbett v. Nutt, 10 Wall. 464, 19 L. ed. 976."

The leading case upon this question, to which reference is universally made, is that of Penn v. Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sr. 444, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 4th Am. ed. 1806. The bill was filed in England, where both parties resided at the time, to compel specific performance of a contract entered into by them providing for the establishment of the boundaries of their respective grants of Pennsylvania and Maryland. In defining the grounds upon which he maintained jurisdiction in the case, Lord Hardwicke said: "This court, therefore, has no original jurisdiction on the direct question of the original right of the boundaries, and this bill does not stand in need of that. It is founded on articles executed in England under seal for mutual consideration, which gives jurisdiction to the King's courts both of law and equity, whatever be the subject-matter. . . . The conscience of the party was bound by this agreement; and, being within the jurisdiction of this court, . . . which acts in personam, the court may properly decree it as an agreement, if a foundation for it."

The learned American editors, in their notes to the above case (2 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 1830), after reviewing the American decisions, say: "It will be observed that in the foregoing cases the jurisdiction attached on the ground of the defendant's fraud or failure to perform some equitable obligation, irrespective of any question of title, and the decree was capable of being enforced against the person of the defendant. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And, although equity has no jurisdiction over naked questions of title to real estate, yet it will not refuse to determine a controversy which, in other respects, is within its jurisdiction, because it incidentally adjudicates upon the title to lands without its control. But these cases must not be confused with another and totally different class, wherein the validity of rights claimed under a disputed title to lands in other states becomes the primary question, and the decree depends upon the construction given. Here the relief will be refused unless under very peculiar circumstances, for to hold otherwise would be to try an ejectment through the medium of a court of chancery, governed by rules possibly differing from those in force where the land is situate, and whose decree would be utterly ineffective as to the subject-matter of the controversy."

And they further say in conclusion: "The result of the cases as a whole would seem to be that, as the right of real property is essentially local and can only be enforced at law by a recourse to the local tribunals, equity will follow the law, and refuse to assume a power which might further the purposes of justice in particular instances, but would ultimately disturb the comity which ought to exist between the courts of different nations, by bringing the decisions of foreign tribunals into conflict with those of the locus rei sitæ. . . . But rights growing out of trust or contract, or founded upon a fraudulent violation of the principles of equity as between man and man, are purely personal, and will consequently be upheld and enforced, both by law and equity, whenever jurisdiction has been acquired over the parties, without regard to the nature of situation of the property in which the controversy has its origin, and even when the relief sought consists in a decree for the conveyance of land which lies beyond the control of the court, and can only be reached through the exercise of its powers over the person."

The question was first passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States in Massie v. Watts, supra, the opinion in which was delivered by Chief Justice Marshall. In that case a bill was filed by a citizen of Virginia in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, against Massie, a citizen of Kentucky, to compel the latter to convey to the former 1,000 acres of land in the state of Ohio, the defendant having obtained the legal title by fraud. The complainant claimed the equitable title, and alleged certain fraudulent surveys by the defendant through which he had appropriated complainant's land. Appeal was taken from a final decree establishing complainant's title and directing the defendant to execute a conveyance to him for the land. In affirming the decree, the Chief Justice said on the question of jurisdiction: "Was this cause, therefore, to be considered as involving a naked question of title; was it, for example, a contest between Watts and Powell,—the jurisdiction of the circuit court of Kentucky would not be sustained. But where the question changes its character; where the defendant in the original action is liable to the plaintiff, either in consequence of contract, or as trustee, or as the holder of a legal title acquired by any species of mala fides practised on the plaintiff,—the principles of equity give a court jurisdiction wherever the person may be found, and the circumstance that a question of title may be involved in the inquiry, and may even constitute the essential point on which the case depends, does not seem sufficient to arrest that jurisdiction." After reviewing the English authorities, commencing with the case of Penn v. Baltimore, supra, he further said: "Upon the authority of these cases, and of others which are to be found in the books, as well as upon general principles, this court is of opinion that, in a case of fraud, of trust, or of contract, the jurisdiction of a court of chancery is sustainable wherever the person be found, although lands not within the jurisdiction of that court may be affected by the decree." See also Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 87, 106, 35 L. ed. 640, 647, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 960.

The doctrine announced has been followed by the same court ever since without question, for we cannot regard the case of Phelps v. McDonald, 99 U. S. 298, 25 L. ed. 473 (relied on by the appellants), either as furnishing an exception to it, or as extending its limitations. In that case the bill was filed in the supreme court of the District of Columbia by Phelps, who had regularly been appointed assignee in bankruptcy under proceedings in the district court of the United States for the southern district of Ohio, declaring McDonald a bankrupt. In the schedule of assets filed by the bankrupt was a brief statement of a claim against General Osborne, of the United States Army, and others, "for burning, in January and February, 1865, from 1,000 to 2,000 bales of my cotton in Arkansas and Louisiana." There was no further description of the claim, except that in a duplicate schedule filed in the office of the register the amount is stated as 7,000 to 8,000 bales, and the claim there, with others, is designated as worthless. McDonald was duly discharged in bankruptcy on March 17, 1869. The assignee, having obtained an order to sell certain accounts, notes, and judgments of the bankrupt, sold them at public sale, including the claim aforesaid. One White became the purchaser of the uncollected accounts, and it is alleged that the purchase was made for McDonald with money furnished by him, and the claim transferred to him by White. It was then alleged that, prior to the filing of his petition in bankruptcy, McDonald had a just and valid claim against the United States for cotton destroyed by the Army; that, being a British subject (a fact concealed in describing the claim), although for many years a resident of this country, he prosecuted the claim before the joint British and American commission, organized under the treaty of May 8, 1871; that the claim was finally adjudged to be valid, and on September 23, 1873, the commission awarded the sum of $197,900 to be paid in gold by the government of the United States to the government of Her Britannic Majesty, in respect of the above claim. That the United States had paid the money to the agent of the British government in the city of Washington, who was about to pay the same to McDonald. An injunction was prayed restraining McDonald and White, or either of them, from receiving said award, and for a decree that said fund be held in trust for the creditors of McDonald, and be subject to the complainant's rights as assignee in bankruptcy. Process was formally served on both defendants and a temporary injunction was awarded. Subsequently, by consent of parties, a decree was made that one half of the amount of the award be received by the defendants to pay the expense of prosecuting the claim before the joint commission, and the other half placed in the hands of George W. Riggs, as receiver, to await the final action of the court; and that McDonald execute all orders, receipts, and acquittances necessary to enable the receiver to obtain the fund. The defendants withdrew their answer and filed a demurrer to the effect that the court below had no jurisdiction of the case; and upon other grounds relating to the rights of the complainant. The demurrer was sustained, the bill dismissed, and on appeal the decree was reversed. The opinion of the majority of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Swayne, who said: "In this case, whether the money be here or abroad, the assignee is entitled to have the question finally settled whether he or McDonald has the better right. This court has twice decided that a British subject can sue the United States in the court of claims, because an American citizen is permitted to sue the British government by a petition of right. The act of Congress creating the court requires reciprocity. United States v.

O'Keefe, 11 Wall. 178, 20 L. ed. 131; Carlisle v. United States, 16 Wall. 147, 21 L. ed. 426. If the claim of the assignee were presented to the British government by a petition of right, and the claim of McDonald were also presented, the parties, in the absence of any judicial determination, would, doubtless, be required to settle their controversy by interpleading, or in some other appropriate form of litigation. If the appellant shall be finally successful in this case, and the record should be presented with his petition, no such question could arise, and judgment in his favor must necessarily follow. Conceding the fund to be there, why should not this question of paramount right be settled in this case, rather than that the American claimant should be subjected to the delay, expense, and other inconveniences of a suit before a foreign tribunal? The adjudication would be as binding in one case as in the other. Where the necessary parties are before a court of equity, it is immaterial that the res of the controversy, whether it be real or personal property, is beyond the territorial jurisdiction. . . . It has the power to compel the defendant to do all things necessary, according to the lex loci rei sitæ, which he could do voluntarily, to give full effect to the decree. . . . Without regard to the situation of the subject-matter, such courts consider the equities between the parties, and decree in personam according to those equities, and enforce obedience to their decrees by process in personam. 2 Story, Eq. § 899; Miller v. Sherry, 2 Wall. 249, 17 L. ed. 830; Penn v. Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sr. 444; Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige, 606, 22 Am. Dec. 689."

Notwithstanding some of the language of the opinion, it is to be observed, as in Massey v. Watts, supra, the case involved a fraud committed by the defendant in re-obtaining the title; and, having jurisdiction of his person, the court could compel him to execute such an assignment as would be necessary to revest the title of the defrauded assignee in bankruptcy; and, the money having been voluntarily deposited in the custody of the court, it could be ordered paid to the established owner.

A recent case in the House of Lords of England carries the doctrine of jurisdiction, by virtue of power over the person, to a great length; but it was maintained because the bill sought the enforcement of a duty under a trust relating to the personal estate of a deceased testator. Ewing v. Ewing, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 34, 40.

In that case a testator, domiciled in Scotland and possessed of a large personal estate in that country and a smaller one in England, by a will made in Scotch form, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

appointed six persons to be executors and trustees, three of whom resided in England and three in Scotland. The trustees obtained confirmation of the will in Scotland, and this was confirmed by the English court of probate. An infant legatee, resident in England, brought suit in England through his next friend, for the administration of the estate as one of the beneficiaries of the trust. Service was had upon all of the trustees, who entered appearance and obtained an order of reference to ascertain if the prosecution of the action would be for the infant's benefit. Upon this reference, the order for further prosecution was made, from which no appeal was taken. Before the action came to trial, the trustees removed all of the English personalty to Scotland. It was held that the English court had jurisdiction to administer the trusts of the will as to the whole estate, and that, as no proceedings were pending in Scotland by which the interest of the infant would have been clearly protected, the jurisdiction was not discretionary, but that the decree was a matter of course. Lord Chancellor Selborne said: "A jurisdiction against trustees which is not excluded ratione legis rei sitæ cannot be excluded as to movables because the author of the trust may have had a foreign domicile; and for this purpose it makes no difference whether the trust is constituted inter vivos, or by a will, or mortis causa deed. Accordingly, it has always been the practice of the English court of chancery . . . to administer, as against executors and trustees personally subject to its jurisdiction, the whole personal estate of testators or intestates who have died domiciled abroad, by decrees like that now in question. The appellants' counsel were not able to produce any precedent for an administration decree limited (where there was a general probate and a general trust) to assets locally situate within the jurisdiction. . . . The English jurisdiction was sustained on the same principle in Johnstone v. Beattie, 10 Clark & F. 42, 84. If English trustees having . . . English trust funds were found within the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts, those courts, upon the same principle, might compel them to do their duty. Ferguson v. Douglas, 3 Paton, 503, 510."

In another recent English case, the facts of which are analogous to those of the case at bar, the court distinguished the decision in Ewing v. Ewing, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 456, (rendered in the chancery division, and not then decided on appeal), and expressly maintained the limitation of the equity jurisdiction, acting in personam, that we have here attempted to point out. Graham v. Massey, L. R. 23 Ch. Div. 743. That suit was brought to recover three fourths of one moiety of the purchase money of a house in Dresden, Saxony, sold by Charles Stewart Hawthorne, the testator. The defendants were his executors and devisees in trust. The house originally belonged to Colonel Hawthorne, a domiciled Irishman, and his wife, Sarah, jointly. By his will, dated in 1851, he gave his real and personal estate, which would include his moiety of the house, to trustees in trust to pay the rents, profits, etc. to his wife, Sarah, for life, and after her death, upon trust for his daughter, Mabella. This will was not executed according to Saxon law. Colonel Hawthorne left his widow and a daughter, Georgiana, surviving; his daughter Mabella having died in his lifetime. The widow died on the 31st of May, 1875, leaving a will executed according to Saxon law, by which she devised all her real and personal property at her residence in Dresden, including this house, to Charles Stewart Hawthorne. In 1875 he sold the house, received part of the purchase money, and the remainder was secured to him by a mortgage of the house, according to Saxon law. He died in 1877. The plaintiffs in this were the administrator and the widow and children of John Graham, the surviving husband of Georgiana. It was alleged, in effect, that on the death of Colonel Hawthorne, one moiety of the house, subject to his widow's life interest, devolved by Saxon law, as to three-fourths part, on Georgiana and the remaining one fourth on Sarah Hawthorne, who was entitled to the other moiety; and that on the death of Georgiana in 1863, John Graham became by Saxon law entitled to her three fourths of one moiety, and that he died intestate. Plaintiffs, as his administrator and next of kin, respectively, claimed three fourths of one moiety of the purchase money, with interest, against the estate of Charles Stewart Hawthorne. It was also alleged that on the death of Sarah Hawthorne, Charles Stewart Hawthorne procured himself to be registered in Dresden as the owner of the house, and so became the legal owner, and that by Saxon law he could confer an indefeasible title on a purchaser; but that a seller under such circumstances became by the law responsible to the person really entitled, if he had acted bona fide, for the purchase money of which he became a trustee for the person really entitled. The defense denied utterly the claims of the plaintiffs, and alleged that Charles Stewart Hawthorne was sole and legal owner of the entirety of the house for his own use and benefit, and submitted that the rights of the parties to this action ought to be determined in the courts of Saxony. Kay, Justice, said: "An important question of jurisdiction arises in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

this case. . . . It is obvious that neither Charles Stewart Hawthorne nor the defendants is or are, with reference to this claim, by English law, in any fiduciary relation to the plaintiffs. They are not bound by contract with them. Nor is the claim in any way based upon a suggestion of fraud. It is a bona fide claim on both sides of title to land, or the proceeds of land, in Saxony. The claim depends primarily upon the law of Saxony as to the devolution of land in that country. If maintainable, it can only be so upon the ground that by the law of Saxony upon the death of Sarah Hawthorne three fourths of one moiety of this property descended to Georgiana Hawthorne, under whom the plaintiffs claim. The next question is whether the plaintiffs, by the law of Saxony, are entitled to such interest, if any, as did so descend to Georgiana Hawthorne. A third question is whether by Saxon law, Charles Stewart Hawthorne having sold the property, he or his estate after his death is accountable for a share of the purchase money to the plaintiffs." After discussing the uncertainty of determining a question purely of foreign law, the court said: "I am not aware of any case where a contested claim depending upon the title to immovables in a foreign country, strictly so called, being no part of the British dominions or possessions, has been allowed to be litigated in this country simply because the plaintiff and defendant happened to be here. Lord Mansfield, in Mostyn v. Fabrigos, 1 Cowp. 161, 176, distinguished such a case from those in which actions might be brought here. He said: 'So, if an action were brought relative to an estate in a foreign country, where the question was a matter of title only, and not of damages, there might be a solid distinction of locality.' The cases cited in the argument were such as the enforcement in England of an equitable mortgage . . . concerning Scotch land, where the court gave relief, treating the remedy as in the nature of specific performance, when the court acts in personam. Ex parte Pollard, 1 Mont. & C. Bankr. 239. There is no doubt of the jurisdiction in such a case, and the courts will even foreclose an English mortgage of foreign land (Toller v. Carteret, 2 Vern. 494); the foreclosure decree being, as Vice Chancellor Bacon pointed out in Paget v. Ede, L. R. 18 Eq. 118, merely an extinction of the right to redeem, as was said, also, by Lord Cranworth in Colyer v. Finch, 5 H. L. Cas. 905, 915. In Norris v. Chambers, 29 Beav. 246, Lord Romilly distinguished the case of a foreign mortgage of foreign land where no relief . . . would be given by the English courts. There is a class of cases in which jurisdiction as to lands in the colonies has been maintained on the ground of fraud, like Cranstown v. Johnston, 3 Ves. Jr. 170. It is not pretended that there was any fraud in the present case. Perhaps the decision that goes furthest in the plaintiff's favor is the recent case of Re Ewing, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 456. There a legatee under a Scotch will or trust deed was allowed to maintain an action for administration against the executors who had proved in England, three of whom were in this country and the others had been served in Scotland, without objection. The usual administration order was made, though there were no assets in England; but the late master of the rolls and Lord Justice Cotton both pointed out that the plaintiff's claim was undisputed, and the master of the rolls repudiated the notion that Scotland is a foreign country for the purpose of such a question of jurisdiction. According to Enochin v. Wylie, 10 H. L. Cas. 1, if the claim had been contested, and had involved a disputed question of the construction of a Scotch will, it may be doubted if a decree could properly have been made. But the case is infinitely stronger where the contested claim is based upon the right to land where the land is situate, not in Scotland, but in Dresden, where the question whether the plaintiff has any claim or not must be determined by the law of Saxony as to immovables, and where the only ground for instituting proceedings in this country is the fact that the defendants are residents here. All these circumstances concur in this case, and, in my opinion, the courts of civil judicature in England, which sit, as Lord Westbury said in Cookney v. Anderson, 1 DeG. J. & S. 365, to administer the municipal law of this country, have no authority to determine in such a case as this whether or not the plaintiff's claim is well founded, and I must therefore dismiss this action."

We have stated the facts of the case and quoted from the opinion at length, because it appears to us substantially to determine the question that is presented here. There is no allegation of contract, trust relation, or fraud on which the jurisdiction may be based. The essential question involved is whether the complainant Morton is the owner of the sand and gravel bar, either by virtue of a deed carrying his boundary to the middle line of Piscataway creek, in Maryland, or if not, by reason of its being a navigable stream, as an accretion to his adjacent shore land. The effect of the decree is to establish his title by a perpetual injunction against the acts of trespass complained of; and this question of title is determinable by the laws of Maryland alone.

We will not extend an opinion already too long by reviewing the several state cases cited on behalf of the appellants. It is sufficient to say of many of these that they related to lands lying in different counties in the same state, and depended in part, at least, upon local statutes defining the jurisdiction of the courts. Others which go very far in the direction contended for—Schmaltz v. York Mfg. Co. 204 Pa. 1, 59 L.R.A. 907, 93 Am. St. Rep. 782, 53 Atl. 522; Clad v. Paist, 181 Pa. 148, 37 Atl. 194; Jennings Bros. v. Beale, 158 Pa. 283, 27 Atl. 948; Alexander v. Tolleston Club, 109 Ill. 65, 77; Carroll v. Lee, 3 Gill & J. 504, 510, 22 Am. Dec. 350, being the principal ones—involve the construction and enforcement of contracts or a trust. Keyser v. Rice, 47 Md. 203, 28 Am. Rep. 448, maintains the right of the courts of equity of the state to enjoin one of its citizens from prosecuting a suit in another state violative of the laws of Maryland, and affecting the rights of another citizen of the same state. The same doctrine is upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States, but stands upon a ground very different from that of the present case. Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 33 L. ed. 538, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269. In another case cited, the same principle is applied, though to a different state of facts. Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Worster, 23 N. H. 462. Complainant maintained a dam extending across the Salmon river from the shore in New Hampshire to the shore in the state of Maine. The defendant, a citizen of New Hampshire and served with process therein, owned lands on each side of the river that were overflowed by reason of complainant's dam. He removed a portion of the dam and threatened to lower it further. The bill prayed that he might be enjoined from destroying any part of the dam, or from meddling with it in any way. An objection to the jurisdiction was overruled, and the decree granting the injunction was affirmed. In the discussion of the question it was said: "The court are not asked to assume any jurisdiction or exercise and control over the land in Maine, or to interfere with the laws of that state. Nothing more is asked than that the respondent, a citizen of New Hampshire and residing within her limits, shall be subject to her laws; and that, being within reach of the process of this court, he shall be forbidden to go elsewhere and commit injury to property of other citizens situated here and entitled to the protection of our laws."

Entertaining the opinion that the court below was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, we must reverse the decree appealed from and remand the cause with direction to dismiss the bill. It is so ordered.

On a motion by the appellees to reform the decree of this court in the matter of costs, Shepard, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The opinion of the court in reversing this case is silent in respect to the question of costs, and the entry of the decree therefor against the appellees was in accordance with the general provision of § 3 of rule 18. The appellees have filed a motion to reform that decree so as to show a reversal without costs to either party. The contention that there should have been no decree for costs, as against either party, because the dismissal of the appeal was for want of jurisdiction in the court below, as governed by § 1 of rule 18, is untenable. That section applies in those cases where the appellate court has no jurisdiction whatever. When the appeal is from a decree rendered by a trial court, without jurisdiction in the premises, the rule is different. In such a case the appellate court has jurisdiction of the appeal for the purpose of reversing the erroneous judgment. Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 379, 387, 28 L. ed. 462, 465, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510; Hancock v. Holbrook, 112 U. S. 229, 232, 28 L. ed. 714, 715, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 145; Graves v. Corbin, 132 U. S. 571, 590, 33 L. ed. 462, 468, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 196; North American Transp. & Trading Co. v. Morrison, 178 U. S. 262, 269, 44 L. ed. 1061, 1064, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 869.

The entry of the decree was, therefore, clearly within the power of this court under § 3, rule 18. That section of the rule provides that in case of reversal costs shall be awarded to the appellants, "unless otherwise ordered by this court." The complainants were undoubtedly at fault in bringing the suit in a court without jurisdiction. The defendants, appellants here, tacitly conceded the jurisdiction of the court below, and were apparently as anxious, on account of convenience, to have the case tried therein on its merits as were the complainants. They made no suggestion of want of jurisdiction at any stage of the proceeding, and the point naturally passed unnoticed by that court. From the decree against them on the merits they appealed to this court, and again failed to suggest the want of jurisdiction. On this appeal, when the argument was begun on the merits, the court of its own motion suggested the probable want of jurisdiction in the court below, and refused to hear the argument until that question could be determined. The result of the suggestion was the conclusion that the court below had no jurisdiction of the case, and that necessarily its decree must be reversed with direction to dismiss the bill. Now, had the appellants raised the question of jurisdiction below, and brought it up as a ground of appeal, there would be no question of their right to recover costs in this court. We must presume, however, that, had the suggestion of want of jurisdiction been made in the court below, it would have prevailed. The result of the failure to raise the question of jurisdiction has been the taking of testimony at considerable expense and a great increase in the volume of the transcript of the record. As the appellants were at fault in the respects indicated, and brought the case here upon the merits alone, we now think it just that each party shall pay the costs incurred by him. Having the power, under § 3 aforesaid, to make such an order, the decree will be reformed so as to require each party to pay the costs incurred by him in this court. It is so ordered.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

Sentence—excessive—effect.

1. The imposition of cumulative sentences in a criminal action, the aggregate of which exceeds the jurisdiction of the court to impose, does not render the entire sentence void, but it will be valid for the term which the court has jurisdiction to impose. Same—release of prisoner.

Power to impose generally.

It has been held in Indiana, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, and Texas that the courts of those states, in the absence of statutory provision, had no authority to adjudge on several convictions that one term of imprisonment should commence to run at the expiration of another. Miller v. Allen, 11 Ind. 389; Kennedy v. Howard, 74 Ind. 87; James v. Ward, 2 Met. (Ky.) 271; Re Bloom, 53 Mich. 597, 19 N. W. 200; Ex parte Meyers, 44 Mo. 279; Prince v. State, 4 Tex. 480.

But in Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, and Texas statutes have subsequently been passed giving the courts this authority. Evans v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 573, 12 S. W. 768; People v. Huntley, 112 Mich. 569, 71 N. W. 178; Ex parte Meyers, supra; Shu-

(February 14, 1906.)

A PPEAL by respondent from an order of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia discharging from custody a petitioner confined under a sentence of the police court. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Daniel W. Baker and Stuart McNamara, for appellant:

The application for discharge was premature.

Re Swan, 150 U. S. 637, 37 L. ed. 1207, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 225; United States v. Pridgemaker v. State, 10 Tex. App. 117; Smith v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 123, 29 S. W. 774.

And such statutes have also been adopted in Iowa, Kansas, and New York. Mieir v. McMillan, 51 Iowa, 240, 1 N. W. 625; State v. Carlyle, 33 Kan. 716, 7 Pac. 623; Re White, 50 Kan. 299, 32 Pac. 36; People ex rel. Tweed v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559, 19 Am. Rep. 211.

But it is held that the New York statute applies only to cases where the separate offenses are charged in separate indictments, and does not apply where separate offenses of the same character are charged in separate counts of the same indictment. People ex rel. Tweed v. Liscomb, supra.

Such a statute, being an ex post facto law, is not applicable to offenses committed prior to its adoption. Hannahan v. State, 7 Tex. App. 664; Baker v. State, 11 Tex. App. 262.

It is generally held, however, that, even in the absence of a statute to that effect, the court has power to impose cumulative sentences upon conviction under separate indictments for separate offenses, the imprisonment under one to commence at the termination of that under the other. United States v. Farrell, 5 Cranch, C. C. 311, Fed. Cas. No. 15,074; Re Esmond, 12 Fed. 827; Howard v. United States, 34 L.R.A. 509, 21 C. C. A. 586, 43 U. S. App. 678, 75 Fed. 986; *People v. And so has it the power to impose such sentences upon conviction of several separate offenses included in one indictment. Blitz v. United States, 153 U. S. 308, 38 L. ed. 725, 14 Sup. Ct. Kan. Crim. Code, § 250 (Gen. Stat. 1901, § 5695), provides that "when any person shall be convicted of two or more offenses before sentence shall have been pronounced upon him for either offense, the imprisonment to which he shall be sentenced upon the second or other subsequent conviction shall commence at the termination of the term of imprisonment to which he shall be adjudged upon prior convictions." Under this statute, it is held that sentences to imprisonment may be cumulative if defendant is convicted upon separate counts or separate indictments for separate and distinct felonies. State v. Carlyle, supra; State v. Hodges, 45 Kan. 389, 26 Pac. 676; State v. Emmons, 45 Kan. 397, 26 Pac. 679; Re White, supra.

In People ex rel. Tweed v. Liscomb, supra, it was held that the excess above the maximum was void where, for crimes identical in character, set forth in twelve counts of the same indictment, the prisoner was sentenced to twelve successive terms of imprisonment, each term being the maximum fixed by law.

This last case has been much criticized upon the ground that it was an authority against the common-law power of the court to impose cumulative sentences in any event. But what the court did hold was that, even if it were proper to join distinct offenses, committed at different times, in the same indictment, there was no warrant in such case for several and distinct judgments or for a cumulative sentence exceeding the maximum for a single offense. The court, however, distinctly said that it had been the practice of that state, even before the same was sanctioned by statute, to impose sentence of imprisonment upon a second conviction, to commence at the termination of an imprisonment upon a prior conviction.

Necessity of specifying that sentences are cumulative.

If the imprisonment under one sentence is to commence on the expiration of the other, the sentence must so state or the two periods of time will run concurrently. Re Jackson, 3 MacArth. 24; Fortson v. Elbert County, 117 Ga. 149, 43 S. E. 402; Re Breton, 93 Me. 39, 74 Am. St. Rep. 335, 44 Atl. 125; Ex parte Gafford, 25 Nev. 101, 83 Am. St. Rep. 568, 57 Pac. 484; Ex parte Hunt, 28 Tex. App. 361, 13 S. W. 145.

Where the judgment fails so to state no presumption will be indulged, in favor of the correctness of the sentence, that it was cumulative. Lockhart v. State, 29 Tex. App. 35, 13 S. W. 1012.

The rule requiring the sentence to state that the second term is to begin upon the expiration of the first has no application in a case where the different sentences were imposed by different courts. Hightower v. Hollis, 121 Ga. 159, 48 S. E. 969.

It is not necessary expressly to adjudge that the second imprisonment shall begin at the close of a former term imposed, where the statute provides that "the imprisonment to which he [the prisoner] shall be sentenced upon the second or subsequent conviction shall commence at the termination of the term of imprisonment to which he shall be adjudged upon prior conviction." Ex parte Durbin, 102 Mo. 100, 14 S. A prisoner serving his term can be prosecuted and sentenced for a crime committed in prison, and for such crime his sentence a cumulative sentence of imprisonment was sufficiently certain where the imprisonment was made to commence at the expiration of an imprisonment under a previous sentence, the number and date of which were given.

In United States v. Patterson, 29 Fed. 775, it was held that a sentence of "five years upon each of the three indictments above named, said terms not to run concurrently," without specifying the order in which they were to run, was uncertain; and that the terms therefore ran concurrently.

In Wallace v. State, 41 Fla. 547, 26 So. 713, it was held that, where a sentence to a term of imprisonment was made to begin "at the expiration of first sentence," and there was nothing in the record or in the language of the sentence to show for what offense, or in what court, such first sentence was imposed, or when it began, or where it was to be executed, or for what period of time it was imposed, such sentence was erroneous because vague and indefinite.

In Ex parte Cox, 29 Tex. App. 84, 14 S. W. 396, where three separate sentences were imposed for three separate offenses, and the cumulative clause was added to the last sentence only, it was held that the first two terms ran concurrently.

In Ex parte Kirby, 76 Cal. 514, 18 Pac. 655, where the statute provided: "When any person is convicted of two or more crimes before sentence has been pronounced upon him for either, the imprisonment to which he is sentenced upon the second or other subsequent conviction must commence at the termination of the first term of imprisonment to which he shall be adjudged, or at the termination of the second or other subsequent term of imprisonment as the case may be,"—it was held that, upon a second conviction before sentence pronounced upon the first, the judgment rendered was valid, although it made no reference to the first; and that the prisoner must serve the terms of the two sentences successively.

And in State v. Lewis, 63 Kan. 268, 65 Pac. 257, under a similar statute (see supra), it was held that a judgment of conviction imposing successive terms of imprison-may be made to begin at the expiration of the one then current.

Kennedy v. Howard, 74 Ind. 87; State v. Wilson, 38 Conn. 126; Thomas v. People, 67 N. Y. 218; Wharton, Crim. Pl. & Pr. 930.

The case is not different where the prisoner serving his term is tried and sentenced to imprisonment for a crime committed before his confinement.

United States v. Farrell, 5 Cranch, C. C. 311, Fed. Cas. No. 15,074; Russell v. Com. 7 Serg. & R. 489; Com. v. Leath, 1 Va. Cas. 151; Howard v. United States, 34 L. R.A. 509, 21 C. C. ment under several counts, and containing a condition that the period of imprisonment under each cumulative sentence should begin at the expiration of the period of sentence under a preceding count, which judgment did not specify the date of commencement of imprisonment under any of the counts, was not for such reason uncertain or indefinite as to the time of commencement of either the separate or aggregate terms of imprisonment.

But in Ex parte Morton, 132 Cal. 346, 64 Pac. 469, it was held that, under this statute, where a defendant had already been sentenced for one crime, a subsequent judgment upon a conviction for another crime, after judgment pronounced upon the first, reciting that the second term of imprisonment was to commence at the expiration of the first term, was void, and the prisoner must be discharged upon serving the longer term.

And it was so held in Ex parte Meyers, 44 Mo. 279, under a similar statute.

In People v. Forbes, 22 Cal. 135, it was held that the fact that the time of commencement of the terms of imprisonment under the successive sentences depended upon the existence of other judgments not specified, and ascertainable only by referring to the records of the court, would not render such sentences void where each sentence recited, "said term to commence at the expiration of previous sentences."

But in Williams v. State, 18 Ohio St. 47; Pickett v. State, 22 Ohio St. 405; and Larney v. Cleveland, 34 Ohio St. 599,—an opposite view was taken; and in the Pickett case the court said: "The terms of a sentence of imprisonment ought to be so definite and certain as to advise the prisoner and the officer charged with the execution of the sentence of the time of its commencement and termination, without their being required to inspect the records of any other court, or the record of any other case."

For the obvious reason that the prior term of imprisonment may be shortened by the good behavior of the defendant, by executive clemency, or by a reversal of the judgment, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Ex parte Moseley, 30 Tex. App. 338, 17 S. W. 418, it was held that the cumulative punishment need not be pronounced by the judgment of conviction if it is entered in the final judgment and sentence.

In Mieir v. McMillan, 51 Iowa, 240, 1 N. W. 525, it appeared that the statute provided: "If the defendant is convicted of two or more offenses before judgment on either, the punishment of which is or may be imprisonment, the judgment may be so rendered that the imprisonment upon any one shall commence at the expiration of the imprisonment upon any of the other offenses;" that defendant, convicted upon two indictments, was separately sentenced upon the same day, neither judgment expressly providing that one term should commence at the expiration of the other; but the mittimus in the case in which judgment was last rendered did so provide. The defendant was held not entitled to his discharge until he had served both terms.

But in Re Jackson, 3 MacArth. 24, it was held that the mittimus must strictly pursue the judgment; and, where the judgment does not make the sentence cumulative, and the mittimus does, the latter cannot be resorted to for the purpose of justifying imprisonment beyond the first conviction.

tion for the writ of habeas corpus May 4, 1905, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and the writ was issued by the court and directed James H. Harris, warden of the District jail, to produce Robert Lang in court, and, upon hearing, the learned court below directed the discharge of the petitioner from the custody of the warden of the jail, who appealed to this court.

In the police court of the District of Columbia, on June 27, 1904, upon an information charging him with an assault, to which he pleaded "not guilty," Robert Lang was tried and convicted. He was sentenced to pay a fine of $200, and, in default of payment of the fine, was committed to imprisonment in the District jail for three hundred and sixty-four days. On the same day the appellee, upon another information charging him with an assault, pleaded "guilty," and was remanded to jail to await sentence. While serving sentence under commitment for the first assault, the appellee was brought into the police court on March 14, 1905, and was sentenced under the second information, to which he had pleaded guilty, for a period of one hundred and eighty days, the said term "to take effect upon the expiration of sentence imposed in U. S. case No. 135,816, of date June 27, 1904."

When, on May 4, 1905, the appellee filed his petition for the writ of habeas corpus, he had been confined in the jail for ten months and seven days. In his petition the appellee charged that the sentence imposed on March 14, 1905, was null and void; that, deducting the time to which he was entitled on account of good conduct, the period of his first sentence had expired, and that his present and further detention was unlawful. The appellant, the warden of the jail, in his return to the writ, stated that he held the appellee by virtue of the two sentences of the police court and the commitments issued thereon; that the assault in the first commitment mentioned was upon one Ida Middleton, while that in the second commitment mentioned was upon Ollie Brown.

The learned court below discharged the prisoner from custody, holding that the police court had no jurisdiction to impose sentence in case No. 135,817, and that the sentences imposed in No. 135,816 and No. 135,817 were cumulative and aggregated more than one year. The appellant contends that the court below erred upon both grounds, and therefore erred in not remanding the appellee to serve the residue of the two sentences, imposed upon him for two different offenses upon two different informations. Allowing a deduction for good conduct, the appellee's first term should have expired about April 25, 1905. If the appellee served the term of the sentence in the second charge, deducting time for probable good conduct, his incarceration should have terminated about September 26, 1905, and his release on May 5, 1905, was premature.

the prisoner was convicted of five distinct crimes of the same class set forth in five counts of an indictment, the maximum punishment for any one of which was imprisonment not to exceed two years, it was held that a single sentence for five years' imprisonment would not be construed as one for cumulative sentences, but would be held void for the excess above two years.

In Rex v. Robinson, 1 Moody, C. C. 413, it was held that a prisoner convicted of two separate offenses, charged in two counts, may be sentenced under consecutive judgments to two consecutive terms; but that one judgment extending beyond the maximum punishment fixed by law for either offense is bad.

As affected by deduction of time for good behavior.

In Re Packer, 18 Colo. 525, 33 Pac. 578, it was held that, for the purposes of the statute, which increases from year to year the deduction of time allowed for good behavior, cumulative sentences were to be construed as one continuous sentence.

The possibility of a deduction by good-time credits, although contingent upon the conduct of the convict, does not render the cumulative sentence so indefinite or uncertain that it will be invalid. Howard v. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

United States, 34 L.R.A. 509, 21 C. C. A. 586, 43 U. S. App. 678, 75 Fed. 986; Ex parte Ryan, 10 Nev. 261.

A contrary view was taken in Re Bloom, 53 Mich. 597, 19 N. W. 200, and Re Lamphere 61 Mich. 105, 27 N. W. 882. But a statute now authorizes such sentences in Michigan. People v. Huntley, 112 Mich. 569, 71 N. W. 178.

Effect of reversal or invalidity of first conviction.

A cumulative sentence is void for uncertainty where the prior sentence is afterward declared void on appeal (Ex parte Roberts, 9 Nev. 44, 16 Am. Rep. 1); or where the statute under which the prior conviction was had is afterward declared unconstitutional (Ex parte Jordan, 7 Ohio N. P. 563).

But in Brown v. Com. 4 Rawle, 259, 26 Am. Dec. 130, this contention was made, and it was held that the term of the second sentence began to run from the time of the reversal of the first.

And in Ex parte Jackson, 96 Mo. 116, 8 S. W. 800, where there were three successive sentences, it was held that reversal of the judgment as to the middle term did not entitle defendant to discharge upon expiration of his first term.

In Kite v. Com. 11 Met. 581, it was held 1340, chap. 854] allows for good conduct to all persons sentenced to imprisonment in the jail or the workhouse a deduction of five days in each month for the term.

Section 934 of the Code [31 Stat. at L. 1341, chap. 854] provides that "when any person is sentenced for a term longer than six months, and not longer than one year, such imprisonment shall be in the jail; and, where the sentence is imprisonment for more than one year, it shall be in the penitentiary. Cumulative sentences aggregating more than one year shall be deemed one sentence for the purposes of the foregoing provision. When the punishment of an offense may be imprisonment for more than one year, the prosecution shall be in the supreme court of the District [of Columbia]. When the maximum punishment is [a fine only or] imprisonment for one year or less, the prosecution may be in the police court."

The appellee contends that, under this section, the two sentences he was required to serve were cumulative sentences aggregating more than one year and should be deemed one sentence. In this view, the appellee's imprisonment would have been lawful until June 26, 1905, for sentence or sentences not exceeding one year. If the court have jurisdiction to sentence for one year, such sentence is valid within the limit of the court's jurisdiction, and in this view the petitioner could only be relieved from so much of the sentence or sentences as exceed one year.

that, upon reversal of the judgment in the first case, the sentence expires, and the subsequent sentence then takes effect as if the previous one had expired by lapse of time.

In Blitz v. United States, 153 U. S. 308, 38 L. ed. 725, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 924, it was held that, where the term of imprisonment under the judgment on the third count of an indictment was made to commence upon the expiration of the judgment on the first count, and the judgment on the first count was reversed on error, the term of imprisonment on the third count should commence on the date fixed for it to commence on the first count.

In Gregory v. Queen, 15 Q. B. 974, where cumulative sentences were imposed upon conviction on four counts, and upon error the court decided that the third count was insufficient, it was held that the sentence on the fourth count was not thereby invalidated, and that the imprisonment on it would commence from the end of the imprisonment on the second count.

Miscellaneous.

Upon conviction on a number of counts, the court cannot pronounce judgment as to but one count, and suspend it as to the others until after the term of imprisonment 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"A prisoner under an excessive sentence cannot be discharged until he has performed so much of the judgment, or served out so much of the sentence, as it was within the power of the court to impose." Re Swan, 150 U. S. 637, 653, 37 L. ed. 1207, 1211, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 225; United States v. Pridgeon, 153 U. S. 48, 62, 38 L. ed. 631, 636, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 746; People ex rel. Trainor v. Baker, 89 N. Y. 467.

The discharge of the appellee in this instance was premature, and the learned court below, upon the view taken by it that the two sentences were cumulative, had no authority to relieve the petitioner, who should have been remanded to the custody of the appellant to serve out the remainder of the year at least. But we do not agree with the court below that the sentence imposed June 27, 1904, in case No. 135,816, and the sentence imposed March 14, 1905, in case No. 135,817, were cumulative. Upon the first conviction for the assault upon Ida Middleton, sentence was imposed June 27, 1904, that the appellee pay a fine of $200, and the appellee was confined in jail in default of payment of the fine imposed, committed for the term of three hundred and sixty-four days. This was in accordance with § 44 of the Code [31 Stat. at L. 1196, chap. 854]. The sentence imposed on March 14, 1905, was for an assault upon Ollie Brown, and was for a term of imprisonment of one hundred and eighty days. The two sentences were imposed upon different in-has been served and defendant released. Re Beck, 63 Kan. 57, 64 Pac. 971.

In Ex parte Banks, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 201, 53 S. W. 688, it was held that judgments imposing fines are cumulative and independent of each other, and the payment of one is not a satisfaction of the other.

In State v. O'Neil, 58 Vt. 140, 56 Am. Rep. 557, 2 Atl. 586, it was held that a judgment imposing punishment by way of fines aggregating over $6,000, and, in case the fines were not paid within a limited time, defendant to be confined at hard labor in the house of correction for a term exceeding fifty-four years, for 307 distinct violations of the liquor law, was not cruel and unusual punishment. A writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States (144 U. S. 323, 36 L. ed. 450, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693) was dismissed because the record failed to present a Federal question. But three of the justices, dissenting, were of the opinion that the punishment inflicted in this particular case was cruel and unusual.

In Bullard v. State, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 270, 50 S. W. 348, it was held that, unless the conviction occurred at the same term that defendant was tried, the court would not be authorized to make the sentence cumulative without record evidence of his former convictions, together with oral evidence of his identity.

formations, after separate convictions at different times, the punishments were different in character, and the appellee was convicted for separate assaults upon different persons.

The court below has in general term more than once upheld similar sentences. "The law is well settled that in a criminal case there is no error in a judgment making one term of imprisonment commence when another terminates; and, when this forms part of the sentence, the judgment is then considered sufficiently certain as to the time when the successive sentences are to be carried into execution." Re Jackson, 3 MacArth, 24, 26; Re Fry, 3 Mackey, 141. This applies not only to the second sentence of the appellee, which was imprisonment for the assault, but as well to the first sentence, which was a fine and imprisonment in default of payment of the fine. This court of appeals referred to the fact that there is a well-defined system of commutation of fines provided in this District in United States v. Mills, 11 App. D. C. 506, saying: "We need go no further back than the last act of Congress upon this subject, the act of July 23, 1892 (27 Stat. at L. 262, chap. 236), wherein it was expressly provided that, 'in all cases where the said [police] court shall impose a fine, it may, in default of the payment of the fine imposed, commit the defendant for such a term as the court thinks right and proper, not to exceed one year.'" This provision is now § 44 of the Code, and was considered by this court in Bowles v. District of Columbia, 22 App. D. C. 328, where it is said: "Imprisonment is not provided . . . by the Code as an alternative punishment; but imprisonment is very properly provided as the only available mode for the enforcement of the fines imposed as punishment. Without it there would be no practicable means for the enforcement of fines. When imprisonment is provided as an alternative punishment, it is proper so to state, and it is so stated in the laws. . . . Imprisonment could not be imposed in this case primarily; and it is always competent for the party to avoid it by paying his fine. It would not be competent for him to avoid it if it were originally imposed as punishment."

In the case before us, in June the appellee was sentenced to pay a fine, or in default to be imprisoned; in March following he was sentenced to imprisonment. Whatever may be meant by "cumulative sentences," in § 934 of the Code, the term has no application to fines as punishment.

very similar to the provisions of the Code, it is said: "The statute regulating cumulative sentences refers only to cases in which imprisonment in the penitentiary or the county jail is a part of the punishment."

We are of opinion that the language of § 934 of the Code, "cumulative sentences aggregating more than one year shall be deemed one sentence for the purposes of the foregoing provision," has no reference to a sentence to pay a pecuniary fine followed by imprisonment in default of payment, but relates only to cases in which the punishment is to be imprisonment. It should be observed that the language just quoted sanctions cumulative sentences by the police court, the total of which do not aggregate more than one year. We conclude that the two sentences for which the appellee was imprisoned were lawful sentences and should have been served. Nor are the sentences cumulative merely because two imprisonments are made successive in point of time, if it happen that the prisoner convicted upon two separate informations receives two separate definite sentences for the two separate offenses.

The supreme court of Minnesota said: "There are raised in this case only two questions. . . . These are that the sentence is cumulative, and that a sentence cannot be made to commence at a future day. If both offenses had been charged in one indictment, and there had been but one trial, and the plaintiff in error had been sentenced upon each count in the indictment, both sentences exceeding in the aggregate the punishment prescribed by law for such offense, the objection that the sentence were cumulative might be made. But we have never seen it laid down by any court or text writer that, because a person upon a conviction for one offense had been sentenced to the full extent of the power of the court to punish, the court cannot sentence him upon another conviction, under another indictment, separately tried, for a similar but distinct offense. It is not a case of cumulative sentences. The power of a court to make the term of imprisonment imposed by one sentence to commence at the expiration of the term imposed by another sentence exists from necessity; for, otherwise, a person might be convicted at the same term of court for several distinct, similar, or dissimilar offenses, and the court have power to punish for only one. A sentence to imprisonment ought to be certain as to the time when it shall commence and end; but where the court has to punish by imprisonment upon each of several convictions, to make one term commence at the expiration, by lapse of time or otherwise, of a preceding term, makes the sentence as certain as is possible under the circumstances." Mims v. State, 26 Minn. 498, 499, 5 N. W. 374.

And in Williams v. State, 18 Ohio St. 47, the supreme court of Ohio said: "To hold that where there are two convictions and judgments of imprisonment at the same term, both must commence immediately, and be executed concurrently, would clearly be to nullify one of them. To postpone the judgment in one case until the termination of the sentence in the other would, if allowable, be attended with obvious inconvenience and expense, without any correspondent benefit to the convict. There is nothing in the statute requiring this, and it is not to be construed so as to defeat or impede the execution of its own provisions as to the punishment of crimes. We think, both upon principle and the weight of authority, that we are required to hold that it is not error, upon a conviction in a criminal case, to make one term of imprisonment commence when another terminates. There is but little force in the objection that the term of the commencement of the second term is contingent and uncertain. It is true that the first term may be ended by a pardon or a reversal of judgment, but its termination will be rendered certain by the event, and then the second sentence, by its terms, takes effect."

And the supreme court of Nebraska, answering a similar objection, said: "But, in our opinion, the great weight of authority is in favor of the proposition that upon conviction of several offenses, charged in separate indictments, or in separate counts of the same indictment, the court has power to impose cumulative sentences." Re Walsh, 37 Neb. 454, 55 N. W. 1076.

In Blitz v. United States, 153 U. S. 308, 317, 318, 38 L. ed. 725, 728, 729, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 924, the defendant was convicted upon each of the three counts in the indictment. A motion in arrest of judgment was sustained as to the second count, and the defendant was sentenced on the first count to an imprisonment in the penitentiary for a year and a day, and on the third count for a like period beginning upon the expiration of the sentence on the first count. The Supreme Court held that the motion in arrest of judgment should have been sustained as to the first count also. It affirmed the judgment on the third count, and directed that the term of imprisonment thereunder should be held to commence on the day named for the commencement of the first term. As the court below had pronounced judgment on both the first and third counts, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the imprisonment under the third count commenced upon the expiration of the judgment on the first count; therefore, the plaintiff in error contended that there should be a new trial, but the Supreme Court said: "In Kite v. Com. 11 Met. 581, 585, it appeared that the accused was sentenced for a named period to confinement at hard labor, to take effect from and after the expiration of three previous sentences specified. The judgment was objected to as erroneous and void, because there were not three former sentences, legal and valid, and therefore no fixed time from which the punishment on the last sentence should begin. Chief Justice Shaw, referring to this objection, and delivering the unanimous judgment of the court, said that it was not error in a judgment in a criminal case to make one term of imprisonment commence when another terminates. 'It is as certain,' he said, 'as the nature of the case will admit, and there is no other mode in which a party may be sentenced on several convictions. Though uncertain at the time, depending upon a possible contingency that the imprisonment on the former sentence will be remitted or shortened, it will be made certain by the event. If the previous sentence is shortened by a reversal of the judgment or a pardon, it then expires, and then, by its terms, the sentence in question takes effect as if the previous one had expired by lapse of time. Nor will it make any difference that the previous judgment is reversed for error. It is voidable only, not void; and until reversed by a judgment, it is to be deemed of full force and effect, and, though erroneous and subsequently reversed on error, it is quite sufficient to fix the term at which another sentence shall take effect.' See also Dolan's Case, 101 Mass. 219, 223."

The appellee in the case before us committed two successive offenses, and it was competent for the court to punish him for the two different offenses. It would be very unjust to hold that if one person committed one misdemeanor the police court could punish him for that offense; that if he committed a second like offense immediately after the other, he should have immunity from punishment because the two sentences for the different offenses resulted in successive terms of imprisonment.

If this were a case where the appellee were still in jail awaiting the result of the appeal of the warden of the jail, we would reverse the order appealed from and remand the case to the supreme court of the District of Columbia with direction to proceed therein in accordance with law and in a manner not inconsistent with this opinion.

On a habeas corpus, where the personal liberty of the citizen is involved, our decision should be made upon the actual status of the case. This record discloses that the term of the second sentence of the appellee has expired, and, although he did not serve the full period of his imprisonment by reason of his discharge by the court below, the time which he lawfully should have served has now expired. To direct a reversal of the order of the court below would be to do a vain thing.

It appears in No. 135,817 that on June 27, 1904, the defendant was arraigned and pleaded guilty, a judgment of guilty was entered, and the last entry of that date was, "committed to jail and held to await sentence." The next and final entry was "March 14, 1905, sentenced to be imprisoned one hundred and eighty days in jail, to take effect upon the expiration of sentence imposed in U. S. case No. 135,816, of date June 27, 1904. Committed."

We will not consider whether the police court, which may suspend judgment in its discretion for proper reasons shown, and which has statutory power to extend a term of its court, has power to withhold sentence during a long and indefinite period. It may be that in this case the term was extended until the time of sentence. At least, nothing appears to the contrary.

Concerning the suspension of sentence in this case in its present status, we may accept the language of the supreme court of Tennessee that "in favor of the propriety of the action of the court we would presume good cause appeared for such suspension." State v. Miller, 6 Baxt. 513.

Many states by statute provide that the prisoner shall not be discharged under a writ of habeas corpus where it appears that he is held in custody by virtue of the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction; and the courts uniformly hold that the writ of habeas corpus is not to take the place of a writ of error or the appeal. See Smith v. Hess, 91 Ind. 428.

It is not necessary in this case to consider whether or not there are limitations upon the right of the police courts to suspend sentence beyond the current term or the succeeding term, and, if so, what such limitations may be.

The only formal order we can now enter is an order dismissing the appeal, in view of the expiration of the second sentence of the appellee pending the consideration of this appeal by this court. United States v. Mills, 11 App. D. C. 510, 511.

As the appeal must be dismissed, it is now so ordered.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES W. DYERSON, Plff. in Err.,
v.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Railroad—employee on track.

1. The rule that a railroad employee who is engaged in the discharge of a duty, the performance of which requires him to be on or near the track, need not keep a strict watch for approaching trains in order to be deemed to be exercising reasonable care for his own protection, does not apply to the case of an employee who is injured while attempting to cross a track merely for the purpose of getting from one point to another; the circumstances not requiring the crossing to be made at a particular time or place.

Same—duty to look.

2. The fact that such employee works close to a track, and has frequent occasion to pass back and forth over it, does not relieve him from the requirement that, in order that he may be deemed to be in the exercise of ordinary diligence, he must look in both directions for an approaching train before undertaking to cross it.

Same—change of rule.

3. The fact that such an employee knows that it had previously been the rule and practice of the company to run trains along said track only in one direction, except under unusual circumstances, does not

Case Note.—Doctrine of last clear chance as affected by question whether negligence of plaintiff or deceased and of defendant was concurrent:—The point upon which the decision in the above case turns, namely, that the negligence of the plaintiff continued up to the very moment he was hurt, and was therefore contemporaneous and concurrent with the negligence of defendant, has been too often disregarded by the courts in applying the doctrine of last clear chance in cases where the negligence charged against the defendant consisted of some act or omission occurring before the discovery of the peril in which the plaintiff or deceased had placed himself or his property by his own negligence. As shown in a note in 55 L.R.A. 418, the function of the doctrine of last clear chance is not to permit a recovery in spite of contributory negligence, but merely to relieve the antecedent negligence of the plaintiff or deceased, which would otherwise be regarded as contributory, of its character as such; and this result, it accomplishes, by characterizing the negligence of the defendant, if it intervenes or continues between the negligence of the plaintiff or the deceased and the accident, as the sole, proximate cause of the injury, and the plaintiff or deceased's antecedent negligence merely as a condition or remote cause.

relieve him from such requirement, although a change has been made in such rule and practice without notice to him.

Last clear chance—continuing contributory negligence.

4. A plaintiff who has received an injury occasioned by the negligence of the defendant, but who could have avoided it by the exercise of ordinary care on his own part, cannot recover damages therefor, although the defendant ought to have discovered (but did not, in fact, discover) his peril in time to have prevented the accident, where the plaintiff's negligence continued up to the very moment he was hurt, and where the exercise of reasonable diligence before that time would have warned him of his danger and enabled him to escape by his own effort.

In other words, as it is succinctly stated in Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 114 N. C. 728, 25 L.R.A. 287, 19 S. E. 863, 923, the doctrine simply furnishes a means of determining whether the plaintiff's negligence is a remote or proximate cause of the injury. It is apparent, therefore, that, in order to make the doctrine operative,—at least, in order to make it operative so as to sustain a recovery against the defendant when the negligence charged against the latter consists of an act or omission occurring before the discovery of the danger,—the defendant's negligence must have intervened or continued after the negligence on the part of the plaintiff or deceased had terminated. If the negligence of the plaintiff or deceased concurred with that of the defendant up to the very instant of the accident, or if it continued at least as long as the defendant's negligence, the doctrine cannot be properly applied against the defendant.

The importance of this point in the application of the doctrine of last clear chance is clearly brought out by a comparison of the case of Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. supra, with the subsequent case of Pickett v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 117 N. C. 616, 30 L.R.A. 257, 53 Am. St. Rep. 611, 23 S. E. 264. These cases on their facts were very similar, both involving the liability of a railroad company for the killing of an intoxicated person asleep on the track, the negligence charged against the defendant in both instances being the failure to discover the deceased on the track, and not the failure to take proper steps to avoid the accident after discovering him. In both cases it was assumed that the defendant was negligent in failing to keep a proper lookout, but in the first case its liability was denied upon the ground of the contributory negligence of the deceased. The applicability of the doctrine of last clear chance was denied in that case upon the ground that, notwithstanding the intoxication of the deceased, his negligence continued up to the very time he was struck, and was therefore concurrent with the defendant's negligence 7 L.R.A. in failing to discover him. In the last case, however, the doctrine of last clear chance was applied so as to hold the defendant liable, notwithstanding the negligence of the deceased in the first instance in lying down upon the track. The difference in the ultimate decisions in these two cases is due to the court's change of view as to the effect of intoxication upon the question as to the continuing negligence of a trespasser who lies down upon the track, it being held in the last case that the deceased's negligence was to be regarded as having culminated at the time he lay down upon the track in a drunken stupor, and not as continuing up to the time he was struck. It is apparent, therefore, that, though the decisions are diametrically opposed, the first case expressly holds, and the last case clearly assumes, that, in order to sustain a recovery upon the doctrine of last clear chance, the negligence of the plaintiff or deceased must have culminated or terminated before that of the defendant. Other cases have also recognized and emphasized the importance of this point. Thus, in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Sympkins, 54 Tex. 615, 38 Am. Rep. 632, the court held that, if the helplessness of a trespasser at the time he was struck by a train while lying upon the track was due to a fit, his original negligence in going upon the track would not preclude a recovery, assuming that the engineer failed in his duty to keep a proper lookout; but that, if his helplessness was due to intoxication, he could not recover. As shown by the cases already cited, there is room for a difference of opinion as to the effect of voluntary intoxication upon the continuance of the negligence of the plaintiff, or deceased, under such circumstances; yet it is clear that this case makes the application of the doctrine of last clear chance, assuming negligence on the part of defendant in failing to discover the peril, conditional upon non-continuance of the original negligence of the plaintiff or deceased. The distinction made in the last case between helplessness caused by voluntary drunkenness and helplessness

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Charles W. Dyerson was run into by an engine and tender of the Union Pacific Railroad caused by disease is recognized in Southwestern R. Co. v. Hankerson, 61 Ga. 114, though the decision seems to have turned upon the provisions of the local Code.

The effect of the continuance of the plaintiff's negligence to prevent the application of the doctrine in his favor is also shown in Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. McDonald (Tex.) 88 S. W. 201, where the court said that it was settled that the act of sitting upon a railroad track over which cars are expected to pass is a negligent one which precludes a person guilty of it, when hurt, from complaining of mere negligence on the part of those operating the cars in failing to discover his presence and avoid injuring him. The plaintiff in this case had seated himself near the track for the purpose of getting in the shade of the cars, and, so far as appears, he was neither asleep, intoxicated, nor otherwise incapacitated at the time of the accident.

The importance of this point in the application of the doctrine of last clear chance is clearly apprehended by the Maine supreme judicial court, as is apparent from the excerpt from the opinion in O'Brien v. McGlinchy, 68 Me. 552, quoted in Dyerson v. Union P. R. Co., and from the opinions in Ward v. Maine C. R. Co. 96 Me. 136, 51 Atl. 947, and Butler v. Rockland, T. & C. Street R. Co. 99 Me. 149, 100 Am. St. Rep. 267, 58 Atl. 775.

In the last case the court said that the language of the doctrine of prior and subsequent negligence (which is another form of stating the doctrine of last clear chance) implies that the principle is not applicable when the negligence of the plaintiff and that of the defendant are practically simultaneous. In that case plaintiff was injured by a collision between the vehicle in which he was riding and a motor car, as he attempted to cross the track. The court said that, even if the brakeman on the car failed seasonably to take the necessary steps to prevent a collision, which was apparently likely to happen because of the negligence or ignorance of the plaintiff, yet it could not be 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

said that the brakeman's negligence in that respect was subsequent to and independent of the plaintiff's contributory negligence; on the other hand, upon that assumption, the brakeman's negligence was only contemporaneous, not subsequent; that it operated to produce the result in connection with the plaintiff's negligence, and not independently of it; that the plaintiff's negligence actively continued from the corner of the house which obstructed the view of the track to the point of collision; that it was operative to the last moment, and contributed to the injury as a proximate cause. The court seems to have taken this position, even upon the assumption that the brakeman actually saw the situation and ought to have realized the danger. As subsequently shown, there is reason to doubt the correctness of this view as applied to a case where the plaintiff's negligence consisted merely of the failure to discover the danger, and the defendant's negligence consisted of the failure to take proper precautions after discovering the danger. However that may be, the reasoning is unanswerable as applied to the case where the negligence on both sides consists merely of the failure to discover the danger.

The opinion in Little v. Boston & M. R. Co. 72 N. H. 502, 57 Atl. 920, evinces a just appreciation and a clear conception of the importance of the question as to the relative duration of the negligence of the plaintiff and of the defendant in the application of the doctrine. In that case the plaintiff was injured by a collision with an electric car while driving across the track. The court, after alluding to the figures tending to show the space covered by the plaintiff's team and vehicle and the respective rates of speed of the vehicle and car, said that it was apparent that impartial men might reasonably find that, after the plaintiff's negligence in approaching the track had brought him to a situation of actual danger, he might have been unable to avoid a collision with the approaching car by the exercise of ordinary care if he saw the car road Company and severely injured. He sued the company for damages, alleging that his injury was occasioned by the defendant's negligence. At the trial the court rendered judgment against him upon his petition and his preliminary statement to the jury. He prosecutes error.

The material facts disclosed by the plaintiff's pleading and statement may be thus summarized: He had for some time been employed by the company in the Kansas City yards. At the time of his injury he was known as a "car repairer" and one of his duties was to supply cars with ice. Ice for this use was kept in a box four feet high, 4 feet wide, and 8 feet long, placed parallel with a double track, 4 or 5 feet north of the northernmost rail. Between the box and the track were three steps, each 8 inches high; and was conscious of its approach all the time; and that the motorman, by the exercise of like care, might have avoided the collision after he discovered that the plaintiff was in such situation.

Again, in Vizacchero v. Rhode Island Co. 26 R. I. 392, 69 L.R.A. 188, 59 Atl. 105, the court, in denying that the doctrine of last clear chance applied so as to enable the plaintiff to recover for the death of his intestate, who was struck and killed by an electric car while upon his hands and knees upon the track, even assuming that the motorman was guilty of negligence in running the car at an excessive speed, said that the negligence of intestate did not consist in walking upon the track, which he had a right to do, until the car approached, but in remaining upon it after the car was plainly visible, and that this negligence continued until the car struck him. The court also said that the fact that the intestate had impaired his ability to take care of himself by getting intoxicated in no wise affected the case; that intoxication does not relieve one from the degree of care required of a sober man in the same circumstances.

In Richmond Traction Co. v. Martin, 102 Va. 209, 45 S. E. 888, the court said that the general rule as to contributory negligence is subject to the qualification that, where the negligence of the defendant is the proximate cause of the injury, and that of the plaintiff only the remote cause, the plaintiff may recover, notwithstanding his negligence; the doctrine in that respect being that the law regards the immediate or proximate cause which directly produces the injury and not the remote which may have antecedently contributed to it; in such a case the subsequent negligence of the defendant in failing to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring the plaintiff becomes the immediate, proximate, and efficient cause of the accident, which intervenes between the accident and the more remote negligence of the plaintiff. This clearly implies that, in order to make the doctrine applicable in favor of the plaintiff, his negligence must have ceased prior to the defendant's negligence. And that this is a condition of the applicability of the doctrine is also clearly implied in Richmond Pass. & Power Co. v. Gordon, 102 Va. 498, 46 S. E. 772, where the court, while approving an instruction permitting plaintiff to recover, notwithstanding a want of reasonable care in attempting to cross the track in front of a car, if the motorman, by the exercise of ordinary care in keeping a proper lookout could have avoided the accident, also held it error to refuse an instruction requested by the defendant to the effect that, if the act was caused by the concurrent negligence of the motorman and of the plaintiff, due to each failing to keep a proper lookout, the jury must find for the defendant.

Many of the cases, however, in stating, if not in applying, the doctrine of last clear chance, seem to ignore the question whether the negligence of the plaintiff or deceased and the defendant was concurrent.

For example, the Missouri supreme court, in Klockenbrink v. St. Louis & M. River R. Co. 172 Mo. 678, 72 S. W. 900, thus declares the rule in that state: "When a defendant sees, or by the exercise of ordinary care can see, the peril of a plaintiff, caused by the latter's contributory negligence, in time to avoid injuring him, then plaintiff can recover notwithstanding his contributory negligence." This is undoubtedly a correct statement of the rule, upon the assumption that the plaintiff's negligence was not concurrent with that of defendant up to the time of the accident, but culminated and ceased before the defendant's negligence. For the purposes of the first alternative, i. e., when the defendant saw the peril of the plaintiff, the statement perhaps needs no qualification; but, for the purposes of the second alternative, i. e., when the defendant did not see plaintiff's peril, but by the exercise of ordinary care might have discovered it, it seems clear that the statement should be qualified by the condition that the plaintiff's negligence culminated before defendant's. As there was a rack for the purpose, and crushed a quantity of ice with which he filled a bucket, placing it in or near the box. He then walked to a point a little west of the box and waited for the car to arrive. While standing there, his foreman beckoned him from a place south of the tracks and east of where he stood, and pointed to the car which was to be iced. He walked between the ice box and the track to get his bucket of ice, reached it, took hold of it and started to carry it to the car, and while on the lowest step and about to proceed across the track he was struck by the tender of a locomotive which was backing east on the north track at the rate of 15 or 20 miles an hour without giving a signal of its approach and without keeping a lookout along the track.

The track was straight for a quarter of a mile west. It was a clear day, and there was nothing to have prevented the plaintiff from seeing the engine and tender if he had looked. It is therefore manifest that the plaintiff's omission to exercise due caution in his own behalf was fatal to his recovery, unless there was something in the peculiar circumstances of the case to take it out of the general rule, which is thus stated in 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 765: "Anyone who goes upon or near a railroad track is bound, at his peril, to make diligent use of his senses of sight and hearing in order to detect the approach of trains; and if, in disregard of this duty to his own safety, he steps upon the track without looking or listening, . . . he is guilty of such neglisuggested in the note in 55 L.R.A. 418, 451, the Missouri courts, by failing to pay proper attention to this condition, have applied the doctrine of last clear chance in some cases so as to support a recovery, notwithstanding that, upon the facts, the plaintiff, or deceased, and not the defendant, would seem but for his own negligence, to have had the last clear opportunity to avoid the injury. In Morgan v. Wabash R. Co. 159 Mo. 262, 60 S. W. 195, for instance, the majority of the court applied the doctrine so as to uphold a recovery against a railroad company for the death of a person who was guilty of gross negligence in walking upon the track, although the employees in charge of the train did not see him, upon the ground that, in view of the fact that persons were accustomed to walk on the track at the point where the accident occurred, they were bound to keep a lookout even for trespassers. Conceding the duty on the part of the defendant's employees to keep a lookout for trespassers, and their failure to perform that duty, it would seem that, under the facts of that case, there was a corresponding duty upon the part of the deceased to keep a lookout for trains, and that his breach of duty in that respect continued, at least, as long as the breach of duty on the part of the defendant's employees to keep a lookout for him. If so, the case was not one of prior negligence on the part of deceased and subsequent negligence on the part of defendant, but of concurring negligence on the part of both up to the very instant of the accident. This was apparently the position taken by Marshall, J., in his dissenting opinion in this case; and also in his opinion in the case of Holwerson v. St. Louis & Suburban R. Co. 157 Mo. 216, 50 L.R.A. 850, 57 S. W. 770, although there are expressions in the latter opinion which, considered apart from the facts, might be understood as denying altogether the doctrine of last clear chance where the defendant's negligence consisted merely of an omission of a duty to keep a proper lookout. The situation presented in the Morgan Case would have been materially different, so far 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) as this point is concerned, if it had appeared that for any reason the deceased was laboring under a disability which rendered him incapable of caring for himself, since in that case it might be held that, while he was negligent in the first instance in going upon the track, his negligence culminated at that time, and did not continue up to the time he was struck.

The following are illustrations of a class of cases that have stated and applied the doctrine of last clear chance so as to uphold a recovery, although the negligence charged against defendant consisted merely of the omission to keep a proper lookout or some other duty prior to the discovery of the danger in which the plaintiff or deceased had placed himself by his own negligence, without expressly qualifying the doctrine by the condition that the negligence of the defendant must have continued after the culmination of the negligence of plaintiff or deceased: Kolb v. St. Louis Transit Co. 102 Mo. App. 143, 76 S. W. 1050 (collision between street car and vehicle); Barrie v. St. Louis Transit Co. 102 Mo. App. 87, 76 S. W. 706 (Collision between street car and vehicle); Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Schmidt, 35 Ind. App. 202, 71 N. E. 663, 72 N. E. 478 (collision between street car and vehicle); Lassiter v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 133 N. C. 244, 45 S. E. 570 (employee struck by car while standing on track giving directions about another train; this decision may have rested upon the theory that, because of his absorption in his duty, his negligence was not to be regarded as continuing); Reid v. Atlanta & C. Air Line R. Co. 140 N. C. 146, 52 S. E. 307 (person on track, not a trespasser, struck by engine); Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Brantley, 141 Ala. 614, 37 So. 698 (vehicle struck by street car); Turnbull v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 57 C. C. A. 151, 120 Fed. 783 (child on track run over by car); Memphis Street R. Co. v. Haynes, 112 Tenn. 712, 81 S. W. 374 (person struck by street car while crossing or driving along track).

The failure of a court which applies the doctrine of last clear chance to refer ex-gence as to bar an action for the injury." One of the exceptions of the rule is stated by the same authority in these terms (Id., p. 768): "Nor does the principle apply to employees whose duties require their presence upon the track, the performance of which duties necessarily precludes their paying the strictest attention to the approach of trains."

It is argued that the plaintiff in error falls within this exception. If he had been injured while standing upon the steps and engaged in breaking ice, this might be true, for the performance of that duty might have rendered it impracticable for him to keep a strict watch for passing trains, and if, while so engaged, any part of his body could come within the overhang of the cars or locomopressly to the question whether or not the negligence of the two parties was concurrent up to the time of the accident does not necessarily imply that, in its opinion, the doctrine is not dependent upon nonconurrence,—for the reason that the circumstances may have shown that the defendant, if it had performed the duty resting upon it to discover the plaintiff's peril, could have averted the accident, even after it would have been too late for the plaintiff, by the performance of his duty, to have extricated himself. The facts in Kolb v. St. Louis Transit Co. supra, presented a case of this kind. There it appeared that, as the front wheels of the plaintiff's wagon struck the first rail of the defendant's track, he saw a car about 200 feet away approaching him; that he whipped up his horses in an attempt to clear the track, but the car struck the hind wheel of his wagon; it also appeared that the car could have been stopped within a shorter space than 200 feet, and that, if the motorman had seen the team as soon as it entered upon the track, he could have stopped the car in time to have avoided the accident. It is clear that such a state of facts presented a clear case for the application of the doctrine of last clear chance, assuming the duty of the motorman to keep a proper lookout and his neglect of that duty, and conceding that the plaintiff was originally guilty of contributory negligence in getting into the dangerous position, since the performance of the motorman's duty to keep a proper lookout, even after the plaintiff had put himself in a position from which he could not extricate himself, would have afforded him (the motorman) an opportunity to avert the accident; in other words, upon this state of facts, the motorman had the "last clear chance" to avoid the injury. There seems to be a clear distinction between such a case and one where the plaintiff, if he had performed his duty to keep a lookout, could have escaped from his perilous position after it would have been impossible to have stopped the car in time to avert the accident. In the latter case it is clear that the plaintiff, and not tives, the place was not a safe one to work in. But such was not the case. Whatever danger he might have been subjected to while filling his bucket with ice had passed. He had moved to a place of entire safety west of the ice box, and was awaiting an order to carry the ice to a car. When the order came, he had no duty for the time being but to get the bucket and carry it across the track to where the car stood. However great a degree of promptness or haste might have been expected of him, it was not essential that he should cross the track at any particular point nor could his delaying until the engine and tender had passed have been material. He was simply in the position of one having occasion to get from one side of the track to the other. The necessity of his

the defendant, had the last clear chance to avoid the accident; and even if the circumstances were such that either, by the performance of his duty the instant before the accident, could have averted it, still the negligence is concurring, and the case therefore lacks an essential prerequisite of the doctrine of last clear chance.

The failure of the courts to pay proper attention to this important feature in the application of the doctrine may, perhaps, in some instances, be due to the fact that the defendant's breach of duty is stated in the alternative, as the failure to exercise due care after the plaintiff's danger was discovered, or, by the exercise of reasonable care, might have been discovered. As subsequently pointed out, it is not unreasonable to hold the defendant liable in spite of the continuance of the plaintiff's negligence up to the very instant of the accident, if defendant actually discovered the situation and ought to have realized the danger. And, in passing from that alternative to the other, i. e., where the defendant did not discover the danger, but could have done so by the exercise of due care, the importance of the change in the situation as affecting the doctrine of last clear chance is apt to be overlooked. In the first alternative the plaintiff's negligence in failing to discover the danger stands over against the defendant's negligence in failing to avert the danger after discovering it; whereas, in the second alternative, the plaintiff's negligence in failing to discover the danger stands over against the corresponding negligence of the defendant in failing to discover the danger. Assuming in the last case that the negligence of both parties is concurrent up to the very instant of the accident, there seems to be no more reason for holding the defendant's negligence to have been the responsible cause of the accident than the plaintiff's.

It is believed that, if proper attention is paid to the question whether or not the negligence is concurrent, the application of the doctrine of last clear chance in the class of cases where the negligence charged against defendant consists of the omission of a duty picking up the bucket before crossing did not preclude his glancing up the track to see if it was clear. The mere fact that he had habitually worked near the track and was under the frequent necessity of crossing it did not justify any relaxation of vigilance on his part. The tendency of the authorities seems rather to be to regard such circumstances as calling for the exercise of a higher degree of diligence that is expected of a pedestrian who is not an employee. In Wabash R. Co. v. Skiles, 64 Ohio St. 458, 60 N. E. 576, it is said: "It has been laid down as the law that passengers who are required to cross railroad tracks in getting upon or alighting from trains have the right, from the nature of their contract, to expect a safe place for that purpose, and may govern themselves accordingly; but such immunity has never been conceded to travelers upon a railroad crossing having equal rights there with the railroad company, and still less to employees in the yards or depots of the company. The latter have no invitation or implied contract, as passengers do have, to perform their duties in a safe place. The very nature of employment about the tracks of a railroad involves notice of the danger of it, and nobody knows better than an employee that other employees are liable to be careless in the observance of rules, and lax in the performance of duty. Therefore he cannot be permitted to shut his eyes to obvious dangers, and to act with 'full reliance' that rules will be observed, and a safe passage kept for him, whenever his duties call upon before the discovery of the peril will be very materially restricted, and that the objection, sometimes made to the doctrine, that it in effect abrogates the doctrine of contributory negligence, will be correspondingly weakened. The possible variation of conditions and circumstances attending different accidents of the same general character prevents any sweeping generalization on the subject; but it would seem that, if proper attention is paid to the question as to the continuance of the negligence of the plaintiff or deceased, there will be comparatively few cases in which the doctrine of last clear chance can be properly applied so as to support a recovery where a person is injured or killed while walking along a railroad or street railway track, if the negligence on the part of the defendant consisted merely in the failure to discover the danger, since ordinarily in that class of cases the negligence of the person injured or killed in failing to discover his peril must be regarded as having continued up to the time of the accident, or at least as long as the defendant's negligence. (See, however, Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Kidd, post, 143.)

Cases of a collision between a railroad train or a street car and a person attempting to drive across the track afford a greater opportunity for the application of the doctrine against the defendant, since it not infrequently happens in such cases that the defendant, by the exercise of its duty to keep a proper lookout, would have had an opportunity to prevent the accident after any effort in that direction on the part of the driver would have been ineffectual.

The inherent difficulty in cases where the entire transaction covers but a very brief period in determining whether the defendant's negligence continued or intervened after the negligence of the plaintiff had culminated is well illustrated by the case of Rider v. Syracuse Rapid Transit R. Co. 171 N. Y. 139, 58 L.R.A. 125, 63 N. E. 836, where the court, dividing four against three, held that evidence tending to show that a street car might have been stopped within 8 feet after it first struck a wagon crossing the track, but that it did not stop until it had shoved the wagon for at least 20 feet, the wagon being then tipped over and the decedent thrown therefrom and killed, did not justify the submission of the case to the jury under the doctrine of last clear chance. The decision was rendered upon the assumption that the act of the deceased in driving upon the track was negligent, and that the circumstances were such that there could have been no recovery if the injury had resulted from the first contact of the car with the wagon. The majority's view on this point seems to have been dictated by practical difficulties attending the attempt to divide such a transaction into fragments, and impute one part of it to the negligence of both parties and another part to the defendant's negligence alone. On this point the majority opinion says: "This involves a refinement of reasoning and a process of speculation that is scarcely possible or practical in the determination of the rights of parties in controversies of this character." Vann, J., in a vigorous dissenting opinion, concurred in by two of his associates, after stating the circumstances, said: "Can we say, as matter of law, that the motorman was justified in not stopping the car, when a human life was in such imminent peril and he could have stopped it in time to prevent the fatal result. Such a rule would be a reproach to jurisprudence and an encouragement to reckless conduct. As I understand it, our law is not subject to this imputation; but, on the other hand, the humane rule is in force that, notwithstanding the previous negligence of the plaintiff, if, at the time when the injury was committed, it might have been avoided by the defendant by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, an action will lie for the injury."

What has been thus far said (except in connection with a few of the cases above cited) on this subject is upon the assumption that the negligence on the part of the defendant consisted merely of the omission of a duty before the discovery of the peril, and not of a duty after the discovery of the peril. Although few cases have expressly him to cross the tracks. He cannot be excused from the rule that ordinary prudence requires that a person in the full enjoyment of the faculties of seeing and hearing should use them when about to pass over a railroad track, and that the omission to do so is contributory negligence when it immediately results in an injury which might have been avoided if the injured person had looked or listened." Among other cases bearing more or less directly upon this proposition may be cited Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Baird, 36 C. C. A. 574, 94 Fed. 946; Loring v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 128 Mo. 349, 31 S. W. 6; Elliot v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 5 Dak. 523, 3 L.R.A. 363, 41 N. W. 758, 150 U. S. 245, 37 L. ed. 1068, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 85; Abbot v. McCadden, 81 Wis. 563, 29 Am.

St. Rep. 910, 51 N. W. 1079; Carlson v. Cincinnati, S. & M. R. Co. 120 Mich. 481, 79 N. W. 688; St. Jean v. Boston & M. R. Co. 170 Mass. 213, 48 N. E. 1088; Roskoyek v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 76 Minn. 28, 78 N. W. 872; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Yost, 56 Neb. 439, 76 N. W. 901.

It is claimed that negligence cannot be imputed to the plaintiff for his failure to look along the track to the west, because, having had no notice of any change, he had a right to suppose that the old rule of using it under ordinary circumstances only for west-bound trains was still in force and would be observed. This consideration, however, did not relieve him from the burden of watchfulness on his own part. It is doubtful whether there was an obligation on the

made the distinction, and, as already shown, some of the courts have expressly held that, even in the latter case, the continuance of the plaintiff's negligence up to the time of the accident is fatal to the application of the doctrine in his favor, yet there seems to be opportunity for a sound distinction between these two classes of cases so far as the question under discussion is concerned. Under some circumstances, at least, the failure of the defendant to exercise due care to avert the accident after the discovery of the danger amounts to a wanton or wilful injury, to which even contributory negligence is not a defense. But, even when the gravamen of the action is negligence, it would seem that the defendant's duty ought to be determined in view of his actual knowledge of the situation produced by the plaintiff's continuing negligence as an element. It is one thing to hold that the continuing negligence of the plaintiff will prevent a recovery for a negligent omission of defendant to discover his peril, and quite another to hold that the plaintiff's continuing negligence will prevent a recovery for the negligence or the defendant in failing to take proper care to avert the accident after the plaintiff's danger had been discovered and ought to have been appreciated. If there is no question of negligence on the part of the plaintiff or deceased it is immaterial for the purposes of the case whether the defendant's negligence consisted of a breach of duty to discover the peril or a breach of duty to exercise due care to avert the accident after the discovery of the peril; but this difference becomes material in determining the liability of the defendant when it appears that the plaintiff or deceased was also negligent.

In the following cases, where the doctrine of last clear chance is stated and applied without referring to the question whether or not the negligence was concurring, it appeared that the defendant actually discovered the peril of the plaintiff or deceased, and not merely that it might have discovered such peril by the exercise of due care: Harrington v. Los Angeles R. Co. 140 Cal. 514, 63 L.R.A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85, 74 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Pac. 15; Rawitzer v. St. Paul City R. Co. 93 Minn. 84, 100 N. W. 664; Green v. Southern R. Co. 102 Va. 791, 47 S. E. 819; Robards v. Indianapolis Street R. Co. 32 Ind. App. 297, 66 N. E. 66, 67 N. E. 953.

It is frequently difficult, when the court refuses to apply the doctrine of last clear chance in a case in which it does not appear that the defendant discovered the plaintiff's peril, to determine whether the decision was upon the ground that no breach of duty on the part of the defendant had been established, or upon the ground that the negligence of plaintiff or deceased continued up to the time of the accident. In some instances it seems necessary, in order to reconcile apparently conflicting decisions in the same state, to suppose that in one case the negligence of the plaintiff or deceased continued up to the time of the accident, and that in the other it was, for some reason, interrupted before the defendant's negligence had ceased. See, on this point, the opinion in Frazer v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 81 Ala. 185, 60 Am. Rep. 145, 1 So. 85.

Although the point does not fall within the scope of this note, it is not improper to call attention here to the fact that it is essential to the application of the doctrine of last clear chance that the defendant shall have been guilty of some negligence, either before or after the discovery of the peril, constituting a proximate cause of the accident. The mere fact, therefore, that an engineer, for instance, sees a person on or near the track, and fails to take any measures to stop the train, or otherwise to avert an accident, does not necessarily make the doctrine of last clear chance applicable, even if it be assumed that the plaintiff's negligence was not continuing; since the circumstances may have been such as to justify the engineer in acting upon the assumption that the person would of his own accord get out of the way and avoid the danger (see note to 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 498); and this, of course, is true, assuming that the circumstances are otherwise the same, if the engineer did not actually see the plaintiff, but might, by the exercise of due care, have seen him.

part of the company to give notice to the plaintiff of such a change. The information he had regarding the former rule was shown to have been acquired incidentally, and not to have been officially communicated to him as an employee. Of a somewhat similar question it is said in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hart, 87 Ill. 529: "In excuse for not using any precaution to ascertain whether there was any train approaching from the north, appellee urges the practice of the roads to run all trains south from Chicago on the Rock Island track, and all trains north, towards Chicago, on the Lake Shore track; and that therefore, in going upon the Lake Shore track, he was only bound to look south to see if any train was coming from that direction. Appellee was not justified in relying upon any such practice, as the result showed. The companies had the right to change such practice at any time, and to run their trains at all times in either direction, and any dependence upon such former practice was at appellee's risk. This practice before did not excuse the exercise of caution and vigilance in looking for approaching trains in both directions." But, if it was negligence to reverse the method of using the tracks without giving notice, the situation was no different from that presented by the company's sending an engine down the track in disregard of any existing rule, whether relating to direction, or speed, or lookout, or signal of warning, or of any precaution which a due regard for the safety of those about the yards might demand irrespective of formal regulations. If one about to cross a railroad track could rely implicitly upon the company's employees performing their full duty, and if such reliance would excuse the use of precaution for one's own protection, then there could be no room whatever for the application of the doctrine of contributory negligence. It is only when it has been established that the company has been negligent—that is, that some agent has omitted to do something which he should have done and which in a sense everyone has a right to expect him to perform—that any occasion arises to consider whether a person injured has himself been at fault.

Finally, it is contended in behalf of the plaintiff that, even admitting his own want of care to have been such as would ordinarily bar a recovery, still he had a right to submit to the jury the question whether the employees in charge of the engine, by the use of reasonable diligence, could not have discovered his negligence in time to avert the accident; and that an affirmative answer would have entitled him to a verdict. There 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) is a general agreement in the authorities that, where an engineer actually sees a person in a position of danger and then fails to do what he reasonably can to prevent an accident, the railroad company is held responsible for the resulting injury, irrespective of the question of contributory negligence. A logical and sufficient reason for this holding is that such conduct on the part of the company's agent amounts to recklessness and wantonness, and is analogous to a wilful and intentional wrong, and like a wrong of that character establishes a cause of action to which negligence of the injured party is no defense. This reason is not always given in decisions upon the point, perhaps not even generally, but it sometimes is. For example, in Labarge v. Pere Marquette R. Co. 134 Mich. 139, 95 N. W. 1073, it is thus expressed: "Where one wilfully injures another, the doctrine of contributory negligence is not involved, because the injury is not negligent, but intentional. Again, where one is seen in danger, though placed there through his own negligence, one who, thus seeing him, omits ordinary care to avert an injury to him, is not alone negligent, but is wanton, and, as wantonness of this kind is akin to wilfulness, there is an opportunity for applying the same rule."

In a number of cases it has been held that, if the engineer, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have learned that danger was imminent, but did not do so, the liability of the company will be determined in all respects as though he had in fact become aware of it; the constructive knowledge being apparently deemed the equivalent of actual knowledge. It is difficult or impossible to reconcile the decisions upon this and related questions, or to derive from them any generally accepted statement either of principle or result. Many of them are collected and discussed in chapter 9 of Thompson's Commentaries on the Laws of Negligence, especially in §§ 222-247. There seems, however, to be no sufficient reason why the mere fact that a defendant is negligent in failing to discover a plaintiff's negligence, or his danger, should in and of itself exclude all consideration of contributory negligence. Take the not unusual situation of a train being negligently operated, let us say by being run at too high a speed and without proper signals of warning being given. Now, anyone injured as a result of such negligence has prima facie a right to recover; but, if his own negligence has contributed to his injury, then ordinarily his right is barred. How is the situation altered if the railroad employees add to their negligence in regard to speed and signals the negligence of failing to keep a sufficient lookout? The negligence is of the same sort; and, if the contributory negligence of the person injured prevents a recovery when but the two elements of negligence are present, consistency requires that it should have the same effect, although a third element is added. If in the present case the plaintiff was entitled to recover in spite of his own negligence, it must be because the order of its occurrence with respect to that of the defendant made the latter the proximate cause of the injury. This, indeed, is his contention, and to support it reliance is placed upon the following text, which was quoted with approval in Metropolitan Street R. Co. v. Arnold, 67 Kan. 260, 72 Pac. 857, and the substance of which is to be found also in volume 7 of the Encyclopedia, at page 387: "And upon the principle that one will be charged with notice of that which by ordinary care he might have known, it is held that, if either party to an action involving the questions of negligence and contributory negligence should, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered the negligence of the other, after its occurrence, in time to foresee and avoid its consequences, then such party is held to have notice, and his negligence in not discovering the negligence of the other, under such circumstances, is held the sole proximate cause of a following injury." 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 387. This may be accepted as a correct statement of a principle of universal application, according with both reason and authority, provided the words "after its occurrence" be interpreted to mean after the person concerned had ceased to be negligent. The rule that under the circumstances stated the neglect of one party to discover the omission of the other is to be held to be the sole proximate cause of a resulting injury is not an arbitrary, but a reasonable, one. The test is, What wrongful conduct occasioning an injury was in operation at the very moment it occurred or became inevitable? If just before that climax only one party had the power to prevent the catastrophe, and he neglected to use it, the legal responsibility is his alone. If, however, each had such power, and each neglected to use it, then their negligence was concurrent, and neither can recover against the other. As is said in the paragraph from which the foregoing quotation is made: "It is only when the negligence of one party is subsequent to that of the other that the rule can be invoked." In a note printed in volume 2 of the supplement to the American and English Encyclopedia of Law, 2d ed. at page 64, many recent cases are cited bearing upon the subject, and it is said: "This so-called exception to the rule of contributory negligence (i. e., the doctrine of the last clear chance) will not be extended to cases where the plaintiff's own negligence extended up to and actually contributed to the injury. To warrant its application there must have been some new breach of duty on the part of the defendant subsequent to the plaintiff's negligence."

In the present case it may be granted that the negligence of the plaintiff began when he walked between the track and the ice box on the way to get the bucket, and that the employees in charge of the engine were themselves negligent in not discovering this negligence on his part, and the peril to which it exposed him, and taking steps to protect him. But his negligence, as well as theirs, continued up to the moment of the accident, or until it could not possibly be averted. His opportunity to discover and avoid the danger was at least as good as theirs. His want of care, existing as late as theirs, was a concurring cause of his injury, and bars his recovery. This determination is entirely consistent with what Mr. Thompson in his work above cited (§ 240) has styled the "last clear chance" doctrine, as is obvious from a consideration of the terms in which it is stated. As originally announced it was thus phrased: "The party who has the last opportunity of avoiding accident is not excused by the negligence of anyone else. His negligence, and not that of the one first in fault, is the sole proximate cause of the injury." Mr. Thompson rewords it as follows: "Where both parties are negligent, the one that had the last clear opportunity to avoid the accident, notwithstanding the negligence of the other, is solely responsible for it,—his negligence being deemed the direct and proximate cause of it." Expressions are to be found in the reports seemingly at variance with the conclusion here reached, but for the most part the decisions holding a defendant liable for failure to discover and act upon the plaintiff's negligence were made in cases which were, in fact, like Metropolitan Street R. Co. v. Arnold, supra, or were decided upon the theory that they fell within the same rule. There the plaintiff's decedent while riding a bicycle was, through his own fault, run into by a street car. He clung to the fender, was carried some 75 feet, then fell under the wheels, and was killed. A judgment against the street car company was upheld only upon the theory that after he had reached a position of danger from which he could not extricate himself—that is, after his negligence had ceased—the defendant's employees were negligent in failing to discover his peril and stop the car. In Robinson v. Cone, 22 Vt. 213, 223, 54 Am. Dec. 67, the writer of the opinion says: "I should hesitate to say that, if it appeared that the want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, at the very time of the injury, contributed either to produce or to enhance the injury, he could recover because it seems to me that is equivalent to saying that the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care at the time, could have escaped the injury."

The principle thus intimated was embodied in a decision in French v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 76 Vt. 441, 58 Atl. 722, where it is said: "It is true that when a traveler has reached a point where he cannot help himself cannot extricate himself, and vigilance on his part cannot avert the injury, his negligence in reaching that position becomes the condition, and not the proximate cause, of the injury, and will not preclude a recovery; but it is equally true that if a traveler, when he reaches the point of collision, is in a situation to help himself, and, by a vigilant use of his eyes, ears, and physical strength, to extricate himself and avoid injury, his negligence at that point will prevent a recovery, notwithstanding the fact that the trainmen could have stopped the train in season to have avoided injuring him. In such a case the negligence of the plaintiff is concurrent with the negligence of the defendant, and the negligence of each is operative at the time of the accident. When negligence is concurrent and operative at the time of the collision, and contributes to it, there can be no recovery."

To the same effect are these extracts: "There is no testimony suggesting negligence on the part of the driver that does not convict Doyle of an equal or greater degree of negligence. One had no better opportunity to anticipate the accident nor any better means of preventing it than the other. If, therefore, there was negligence, it was concurring negligence, continuous and mutual up to the instant of the accident, which disentitles the plaintiff to recover." Consumers' Brewing Co. v. Doyle, 102 Va. 403, 46 S. E. 391. "In numerous cases it has been held that the plaintiff's conduct is not contributory negligence, if, notwithstanding his negligence, the injury could have been avoided by the use of ordinary care by the defendant. That rule prevails when the plaintiff is in a position of threatened contact with some agency, under the control of the defendant, when the plaintiff cannot, and the defendant can, prevent the injury. It does not apply where both parties are contemporaneously and actively in fault, and by their mutual carelessness an injury ensues to one or both of them. . . . The rule does not apply where, as in the case before us, the negligence of the party injured continues up to the moment of the injury, and was a contributing cause thereof." Robards v. Indianapolis Street R. Co. 32 Ind. App. 297, 66 N. E. 66, 67 N. E. 953. "The plaintiff must show that at some point of time, in view of the entire situation, including the plaintiff's negligence, the defendant was thereafter culpably negligent, and its negligence the latest in the succession of causes. In such case the plaintiff's negligence would not be the proximate cause of the injury. . . . The plaintiff not only negligently put himself in a place of peril, but continued negligently to move on to the catastrophe until it happened. The language of the doctrine of prior and subsequent negligence implies that the principle is not applicable when the negligence of the plaintiff and that of the defendant are practically simultaneous." Butler v. Rockland, T. & C. Street R. Co. 99 Me. 149, 105 Am. St. Rep. 267, 58 Atl. 775.

In Green v. Los Angeles Terminal R. Co. 143 Cal. 31, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68, 76 Pac. 724, it is said of the rule holding the defendant liable notwithstanding the contributory negligence of plaintiff: "It applies in cases where the defendant, knowing of plaintiff's danger, and that it is obvious that he cannot extricate himself from it, fails to do something which it is in his power to do to avoid the injury. It has no application, however, to a case where both parties are guilty of concurrent acts of negligence, each of which, at the very time when the accident occurs, contributes to it." Of the same rule it is said in O'Brien v. McGlinchy, 68 Me. 552: "This rule applies usually in cases where the plaintiff, or his property, is in some position of danger from a threatened contact with some agency under the control of the defendant, when the plaintiff cannot, and the defendant can, prevent an injury. . . . But this principle would not govern where both parties are contemporaneously and actively in fault, and by their mutual carelessness an injury ensues to one or both of them." In Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 114 N. C. 728, 755, 25 L.R.A. 287, 19 S. E. 863, 923, the general rule is thus concretely stated: "Applying the rule which we have stated to accidents upon railroad tracks it may be illustrated as follows: First, there must be a duty imposed upon the engineer, as otherwise there can be no negligence to which the negligence of the injured party is to contribute. The duty under consideration is to keep a vigilant lookout . . . in order to discover and avoid injury to persons who may be on the track and who are apparently in unconscious or helpless peril. When such a person is on the track and the engineer fails to discover him in time to avoid a collision, when he could have done so by the exercise of ordinary care, the engineer is guilty of negligence. The decisive negligence of the engineer is when he has reached that point when no effort on his part can avert the collision. Hence, if A, being on the track and after this decisive negligence, fails to look and listen, and is in consequence run over and injured, his negligence is not concurrent merely, but really subsequent, to that of the engineer, and he cannot recover, as he, and not the engineer, has 'the last clear opportunity of avoiding the accident.' If, however, A is on the track, . . . and while there, and before the decisive negligence of the engineer, he by his own negligence becomes so entangled in the rails that he cannot extricate himself in time to avoid the collision, and his helpless condition could have been discovered had the engineer exercised ordinary care, then the negligence of A would be previous to that of the engineer, and the engineer's negligence would be the proximate cause; he, and not A, having the last clear opportunity of avoiding the injury. The same result would follow in the case of a wagon negligently stalled, when no effort of the owner could remove it; and there are other cases to which the principle is applicable." The principle running through these cases is reasonable, is consistent with the general rules that have met with practically universal acceptance, and, if adhered to, will correct a part of the confusion now attending the application of the law of contributory negligence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Negligence—walking on car track—proximate cause.

2. Whatever negligence exists on the part of one in walking along a street car track in the direction in which the cars move, without constantly watching for the approach of cars, is not the proximate cause of his being run down by a car running at high speed, with no attention by the motorman to the track in front of his car, where the pedestrian is guilty of no negligence in failing to hear the car because of noise made by a car on a parallel track.

Street car company—injury to one on track.

3. A street car company is liable for injury to a person walking on its track, by the propelling against him of a car running at high speed, with no watchfulness on the part of the motorman for persons on the track, notwithstanding he may be guilty of some negligence in being on the track, if he is not negligent in failing to discover the approach of the car, so that his negligence is merely a remote cause of the accident.

Note.—The statement in the foregoing opinion, that the plaintiff "is not shown to have been at fault at and immediately before the time of the accident," seems to indicate that the court regarded the interruption of the plaintiff's negligence before the termination of defendant's negligence as a necessary condition of the application of the doctrine of last clear chance, and to that extent the case is in accord with the view taken in Dyerson v. Union P. R. Co. ante, 132, and the note to that case. It is somewhat difficult, however, to understand how that statement can be reconciled with the assumption, also made by the court for the purposes of the argument, that the plaintiff's conduct in walking with her back to the westward without a constant watch for the approach of a car from that direction constituted negligence. If the failure to keep a constant lookout for a car constituted negligence at all, it is not apparent why that negligence should be regarded as having ceased until the very instant before she was struck, since, if she had looked back the instant before, she would have discovered the car and escaped the danger. The facts in the case indicated that the plaintiff, if negligent at all, was guilty of only slight nonfeasance, whereas the motorman was guilty of gross misfeasance and nonfeasance, and the court would therefore naturally be inclined to sustain a judgment in favor 7 L.R.A. Messrs. W. A. Ryan and Gavin & Davis for appellee.

Montgomery, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages resulting to appellee from appellant's alleged negligence in running one of its cars without warning at a high rate of speed against and over her while walking along its track. A reversal of the judgment is sought for the reasons: (1) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) that the court erred in overruling appellant's motion for judgment in its favor on the answers of the jury to interrogatories; and (3) for error in overruling appellant's motion for a new trial.

The complaint was not challenged in the trial court. It is contended that the complaint upon its face discloses an assumption of the risk and contributory negligence on of the plaintiff if possible. Perhaps the decision would have rested upon firmer ground if the court had held that, while the plaintiff was bound to pay some attention to her surroundings, and take some precautions to ascertain the conditions behind her, it was not her duty to keep a constant lookout, and that the mere failure on her part to keep a constant lookout could not be imputed to her as negligence. Or, possibly, the same result might have been reached by holding that the negligence of the motorman in running the car at an excessive speed through a street where he had reason to expect persons would be on the track, without keeping any lookout, was so gross as to amount to wantonness or wilfulness, to which contributory negligence is not a defense.

the part of the appellee, notwithstanding the allegations that appellee exercised due care and precaution for her safety, and that she was without fault. It is well settled that when a complaint is attacked for the first time in this court, it will be upheld if the facts alleged are sufficient to bar another suit for the same cause of action. We do not find the suggested defects to be real, and any want of certainty in the pleading was cured by the evidence and verdict, and we accordingly hold the complaint sufficient as against the present assault, upon numerous decided cases. Lengelsen v. McGregor, 162 Ind. 258, 67 N. E. 524, 70 N. E. 248; South Bend v. Turner, 156 Ind. 418, 54 L.R.A. 396, 83 Am. St. Rep. 200, 60 N. E. 271; Shoemaker v. Williamson, 156 Ind. 384, 59 N. E. 1051; Xenia Real Estate Co. v. Macy, 147 Ind. 568, 47 N. E. 147; Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Willooby, 134 Ind. 563, 33 N. E. 627; Loeb v. Tinkler, 124 Ind. 331, 24 N. E. 235; Peters v. Banta, 120 Ind. 416, 22 N. E. 95; Smith v. Smith, 106 Ind. 43, 5 N. E. 411. In answer to special interrogatories the jury found the following facts: That, at the time of the accident, appellant had a standard-gauge double-track street railroad on East Tenth street in the city of Indianapolis, extending two or three squares to the east of the place of the accident and for a long distance westward, the tracks being 5 feet apart; that the street was paved with brick; that east-bound cars ran on the south track and west-bound cars on the north track; that appellee had lived in the neighborhood of the accident for four years, and was familiar with the location of the tracks and the manner in which cars were operated thereon; that the accident occurred in daylight on a clear day, and appellee at the time was forty-seven years of age, possessed of ordinary intelligence, and of good eyesight and hearing, and of the use of all her faculties and powers of locomotion; that appellee lived on the south side of Tenth street and her daughter lived on the same side, east of her residence; that appellee started on foot to her daughter's home, and had walked about 500 feet along appellant's track eastwardly before the accident occurred; that the car could have been seen by appellee, had she looked, for a distance of from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ mile before it reached her, and she could have gotten out of the way by stepping 5 or 6 feet to either side had she known the car was approaching; that there was no evidence to show whether any noise was made by the approaching car, or whether appellee could have heard it approach with ordinary care; that appellant's tracks had been swept practically clean of ice and snow, and on the south side of the tracks there was, at the time and place of the accident, from 6 to 14 inches of melting snow and ice, and about the same depth between the tracks; appellee's view westward of the place of the accident for 1,000 feet was unobstructed, and by looking westward she could have seen the approaching car when that distance away, and for a distance of 100 feet she could at any point have stepped out of the way of the car had she known it was approaching, but the noise of a west-bound car prevented her from hearing its approach; that on entering upon the tracks, and again after she had proceeded about half a square, appellee looked westward to ascertain whether or not a car was coming, but no car was then in sight; that the car was operated by electricity, and was traveling at a rate of from 20 to 25 miles per hour, and the motorman did not see appellee, or know that she would not leave the track, until he was within 10 feet of her, and that, under existing conditions, the car could have been stopped in a distance of from 150 to 175 feet; that appellee looked and continuously listened, and used ordinary care to avoid the accident.

Appellant's counsel argue that judgment should have been rendered in favor of appellant upon these facts notwithstanding the general verdict, because appellee is shown to have been guilty of contributory negligence. This contention appears to be predicated upon a misconception of the rights of the respective parties to the use of the street. It is a familiar principle, frequently reiterated by the courts, that street railway companies have no superior and predominant right to the use of the streets upon which their tracks are located over the rights of other users, except the right of way when they require it. Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Darnell, 32 Ind. App. 687, 695, 68 N. E. 609; Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. O'Donnell, 35 Ind. App. 312, 317, 73 N. E. 163, 74 N. E. 253; Buttelli v. Jersey City. H. & R. Electric R. Co. 59 N. J. L. 302, 304, 30 Atl. 700; Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Cooney, 87 Md. 261, 266, 39 Atl. 859; Rapp v. St. Louis Transit Co. 190 Mo. 144, 161, 88 S. W. 865. The highways are laid out for passage, and each passer in a vehicle or on foot has a right of passage over the same, subject to the condition that he does not unnecessarily interfere with the lawful exercise of a similar right by others. Pedestrians have a right to use any part of such highways, but the question whether a particular use is such as a reasonably prudent person would make must depend upon the attendant circumstances. When a certain portion of the highway has been paved as a sidewalk, or otherwise reserved for the exclusive use of foot passengers, and the same is unobstructed and in suitable condition for such use, it may not be prudent to walk in the roadway set apart for the use of vehicles. In considering the question of appellee's alleged contributory negligence, due regard for the reciprocal rights, duties, and obligations of appellant must be observed. Appellant had no right to exclude appellee from its track upon the street, but had the right merely to require her to remove therefrom when she ascertained or was notified that the same was needed for the passage of one of its cars. It appears, from the facts specially found by the jury, that the street along which appellee was passing was covered with melting snow and ice to a depth of from 6 to 14 inches, except the space between the rails of appellant's tracks, which was paved with brick and was practically free from all obstructions. This condition of the street explains appellee's use of the track. She was required to use ordinary care for her safety, and the duty which she owed to the company was to vacate the track when apprised that the same was required for the passage of a car. It must be borne in mind, as against this motion, that the jury were authorized to find that she had a right to assume that appellant's cars would not be run at an excessive rate of speed, and that she was not required to anticipate that a car upon a straight track in broad daylight would run her down from the rear without any warning. Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Marschke (Ind.) 77 N. E. 945; Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. O'Donnell, 35 Ind. App. 312, 320, 73 N. E. 163, 74 N. E. 253; Memphis Street R. Co. v. Haynes, 112 Tenn. 712, 81 S. W. 374, 379; Polacci v. Interurban Street R. Co. 90 N. Y. Supp. 341; Kolb v. St. Louis Transit Co. 102 Mo. App. 143, 149, 76 S. W. 1050.

Appellant's servants in charge of the operation of its cars were required to exercise diligent and constant watchfulness for persons who might be upon or approaching the track. Such servants are required to take notice of obvious obstructions to the ordinary and free use of the street. The drivers of such cars are chargeable only with the exercise of ordinary care for the safety of other users of the street, but ordinary care in law implies a high degree of watchfulness and vigilance when propelling a car at a speed of 20 to 25 miles per hour through the streets of a populous city, where persons on foot and in vehicles are constantly passing and repassing, including the aged, infirm, and crippled, as well as children thoughtless and wanting in prudence and discretion. The accident to appellee occurred in daylight and at a point where the track from the west was straight, and she could have been seen by the most casual attention on the part of the motor-man when the car was 1,000 feet distant. Appellee looked westward when she entered upon the track, and again when she had proceeded half a square on her journey, but no car was then in sight. She listened continuously as she advanced, but failed to discover the approach of the car; and, under the circumstances shown, we are unable to say that she did not have a right to expect that she would be notified of its coming by the customary alarm signal. The jury specially found that the precautions taken for her safety by so looking and listening constituted ordinary care and prudence. We need not decide whether this is a conclusion or not. The rule is well settled that such special findings override the general verdict only when both cannot stand, and the antagonism is apparent upon the face of the record, beyond the possibility of being removed by any evidence legitimately admissible under the issues. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lighthouse (Ind.) 78 N. E. 1033; Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Ott, 11 Ind. App. 564, 568, 38 N. E. 842, 39 N. E. 529. We cannot say that there is any conflict between the general verdict and the facts specially found by the jury in this case, or, in other words, that it affirmatively appears from such facts that appellee was guilty of contributory negligence. A right of action in favor of a person injured by the negligence of another is denied only where his own negligence proximately contributes to produce such injury. It should appear that the complaining party was actively and contemporaneously at fault at the time the injury of which he complains was wrongfully inflicted to preclude a recovery of damages. Harrington v. Los Angeles R. Co. 140 Cal. 514, 63 L.R.A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85, 74 Pac. 15; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 99. In this case it is manifest that appellee exercised special care and precaution for her safety when entering upon the track, and for some distance as she proceeded eastward. Immediately preceding the accident her back was toward the approaching car and she was prevented from hearing the noise ordinarily made by its approach by the running of a car westwardly on the north track, and no alarm was sounded to notify her of the impending danger. It follows, therefore, that, although appellee's conduct in walking with her back to the westward without a constant watchout for the approach of a car from that direction be characterized as negligent in some degree, yet she is not shown to have been at fault at and immediately before the time of the accident, and her so-called negligence in being in a place of danger under the circumstances shown was not a proximate, but only the remote, cause of her injuries. Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Schmidt, 35 Ind. App. 202, 211, 71 N. E. 663, 72 N. E. 478; Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Brantley, 141 Ala. 614, 37 So. 698.

This case falls clearly within the rule that, where the negligence of the defendant is the proximate cause of the injury for which suit is brought, and that of the plaintiff only the remote cause, the plaintiff may recover notwithstanding his negligence; the doctrine in that respect being that the law regards the immediate or proximate cause which directly produces the injury, and not the remote cause which may have antecedently contributed to it. This principle has been styled the doctrine of "last clear chance," and is regarded as an exception to the general rule forbidding recovery by a plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence. It is no departure from just principles, but a wholesome and humane doctrine, to hold that, if, after the defendant knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care ought to have known, of the plaintiff's negligence, he could have avoided the accident but failed to do so, the plaintiff can recover. In cases of this class the subsequent negligence of the defendant in failing to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring the plaintiff becomes the immediate or proximate and efficient cause of the accident, which intervenes between the accident and the more remote negligence of the plaintiff. The principle that the plaintiff's act or omission when only a remote cause, antecedent occasion, or condition of the injury does not constitute such contributory negligence as precludes a recovery, is quite generally accepted, and has been declared by many courts. 7 Am. & Eng. Civ. App.) 85 S. W. 61.

It is clear, from the facts found, that the driver of the car which was run upon appellee, by the exercise of ordinary care while giving attention to his duties, could have discovered her presence and apparent ignorance of the impending danger, and is accordingly chargeable with such knowledge, in ample time to have prevented the accident; and it follows that the court rightly overruled appellant's motion for judgment in its favor.

Appellant's motion for a new trial alleged that the verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence and is contrary to law, and that the court erred in refusing to permit witnesses for appellee, upon cross-examination, to answer the following questions: "That would not prevent it, would it?" and, "She could step off, could she not, and prevent the collision?" and also in giving each of the instructions given at the request of appellee. The questions excluded related to the condition of the street adjacent to the track upon which appellee was walking at the time of the accident. The questions were objectionable in form, and called for an opinion of the witness upon facts and conditions which could be fully placed before the jury. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Green, 164 Ind. 349, 354, 73 N. E. 707, and cases cited. It also affirmatively appears that no harm resulted to appellant from these rulings, even though they were conceded to be erroneous. In answer to interrogatory No. 30, the jury expressly found that, within 100 feet of the place of the accident, there was nothing to prevent appellee from stepping far enough from the track to be out of the way of the passing car, if she had known it was coming. The jury, therefore, found the fact and conclusion upon this point in accord with appellant's contention, and left no room for complaint.

The court gave 21 instructions at the request of appellee. Their number forbids detailed discussion, but they were applicable to the case, and in the main embodied legal principles declared in the cases of Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Schmidt, 35 Ind. App. 202, 71 N. E. 663, 72 N. E. 478, and Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Darnell, 32 Ind. App. 687, 68 N. E. 609, and were in accord with the law as announced and approved in the preceding part of this opinion.

The court gave 13 instructions at the request of appellant, and it is now insisted that some of them were in conflict with instructions given at the request of appellee. The instructions given at appellee's request were correct statements of the law applicable to the facts established by the evidence. The instructions given at appellant's request are not set out, either in full or in substance, in appellant's brief, and we are precluded by our rules from searching the record in order to make the comparison suggested. It is clear, at all events, that, if the instructions given by the court independently of appellant's request were correct, as we have found them to be, appellant could not be allowed to procure the giving of an inapplicable, inconsistent, or erroneous instruction, and thereupon be heard to complain of such error. Elliott, App. Proc. § 626.

The complaint alleged that, in attempting to cure herself and to heal her wounds, appellee had expended the sum of $200 for doctor bills and medicine. The evidence showed that she had personally incurred a medical bill of $170 on account of her injuries. The court charged the jury, in one of the instructions of which complaint is made, that, if they found for plaintiff, in estimating her damages, they might take into account the amount of money she had been compelled to expend, if any, in attempting to cure herself. It appears that she was a married woman, but, under the averments of the complaint and the proof adduced in support of the same, the instruction was proper. Ordinarily the husband is chargeable with the payment of the medical bills of the wife, but he is not so chargeable under all circumstances; and, even in cases where the husband may be legally liable for such debts, that fact will not deprive the wife of the right and power to bind herself therefor, if she chooses to do so. If appellee personally contracted to pay these bills, as alleged and proved, she may recover the same in case she has a right of the recovery for the physical injury to which they were incident. Nelson v. Spaulding, 11 Ind. App. 453, 39 N. E. 168.

where the accident occurred, but the space intended for a sidewalk was covered with mud and gravel thrown from the street in making excavations for street improvements. There was a space of 8 feet between the south rail and the curb, covered with melting snow and ice from 6 to 14 inches in depth, unbroken either by pedestrians or vehicles. Pedestrians had been and were using the space between the rails in traveling east or west along that part of the street. Two other persons besides appellee were so using the street in that vicinity, at the time of the accident. The track westward was straight and substantially level for half a mile. The day was clear and the sun shining. The car approached at a speed at from 20 to 30 miles per hour, without sounding the gong or giving any warning, and ran from 185 to 200 feet, as given by one witness, after striking appellee, before it could be stopped. No reason was advanced by the motorman for his failure to observe appellee sooner than he did. It is apparent from these conditions that the motorman was required to be on the lookout for pedestrians using the track, and to have his car under such control as to avoid collision under ordinary circumstances. In the exercise of ordinary care he would have discovered appellee and her manifest peril and apparent unconsciousness of danger when far away, and, by the exercise of like care thereafter, he could have given her due warning or stopped the car and avoided the accident. The motorman testified that he observed appellee talking to a Mr. Patterson, and that she stepped from the side of the track immediately in front of the car when it was within 15 feet of her. The jury did not accept this explanation, and we cannot disturb their conclusion upon the weight of the evidence. The verdict is sustained by evidence, and is not contrary to law, and no error was committed in overruling appellant's motion for a new trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to a ruling of the Superior Court for Suffolk County directing a verdict in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Powers & Hall and H. W. Dunn, for plaintiff:

Defendant's servants assumed full charge and control of plaintiff's person, and, having done so, they were bound to use due care in respect to what they did with him.

Moody v. Boston & M. R. Co. 189 Mass. 277, 75 N. E. 631; Mackin v. People's Street R. & Electric Light & P. Co. 45 Mo. App. 82; Columbus, C. & I. C. R. Co. v. Powell, 40 Ind. 38.

Plaintiff's negligence is a bar only if a contributing cause.

When the plaintiff's negligence or wrongdoing has placed his person or property in a dangerous situation, which is beyond the plaintiff's immediate control, and the defendant, having full knowledge of the dangerous situation, and full opportunity, by the exercise of reasonable care, to avoid any injury, is nevertheless negligent so that injury results, the defendant is liable for the injury.

Union P. R. Co. ante, 132, considered the effect of intoxication to interrupt the antecedent negligence of the person killed or injured, and thus to permit the application of the doctrine of last clear chance. There is some conflict among those cases on the point, but they are all distinguishable from the case at bar for the reason that in each of them the intoxicated person placed himself in a position of peril without any responsibility on the part of the defendant in the first instance, and the breach of duty on the part of the defendant that subsequently intervened was nonfeasance merely, and not misfeasance; whereas in the case at bar the defendant's employees put the plaintiff in a perilous position, and were chargeable with misfeasance, and not merely with nonfeasance. It may be fairly open to question whether voluntary intoxication ought to be regarded as interrupting the negligence of one who, without any responsibility on the part of the defendant in the first instance, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

has placed himself in a position of peril, thereby relegating the antecedent negligence to the category of a remote cause or a mere condition, and thus permitting the application of the doctrine of last clear chance to the mere subsequent nonfeasance of defendant, e. g., the omission of train men to keep a proper lookout. But when, as in the case at bar, an intoxicated person, as a mere inert body, is placed in a position of peril without any volition on his part, and by the positive misfeasance of the defendant's servants, there seems to be no difficulty whatever in regarding his negligence in becoming intoxicated in the first instance, or in boarding the train in that condition, as a mere condition, and not a proximate cause of his injury; thus creating one of the necessary conditions of the application of the doctrine of last clear chance, or, as it is sometimes termed, the doctrine of antecedent and subsequent negligence.

Mr. C. H. Walker also for plaintiff.

Messrs. Choate, Hall, & Stewart for defendant.

Knowlton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover for an injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants. The plaintiff was a passenger on the defendant's train which ran from Boston through Ashmont on the evening of February 7, 1903. He testified to having become so intoxicated that he had no recollection of anything that occurred after leaving a cigar store in Boston, until he awoke in the Boston City Hospital, about 4 o'clock the next day. One Thompson testified "that he took the 9:23 train on the evening of February 7, 1903, at the South Station in Boston, for Ashmont, and occupied a seat near the rear of the last car of the train; that there were about 20 passengers in the car, and he noticed Black sitting in the seat opposite, very erect, with his eyes closed. When the conductor came through Mr. Black went through his pockets as if he were looking for a ticket, and not being able to find it, tendered a 50-cent piece in payment for his fare. The conductor began to name off the stations, from Field's Corner first, and then Ashmont, and when he said Ashmont Mr. Black nodded his head. The conductor gave him his change and his rebate check. At Ashmont, where the train stops, there is a gravel walk running the whole length as a platform, then there is a flight of steps—10 or 12—that leads up to the asphalt walk around the station; so when you go up from the steps you have to walk along this walk. The conductor and brakeman took Black out of the car, one on each side. The distance from the steps of the car to the steps that lead up to the station was 25 feet. As they went along the platform the conductor and train man were on each side of him. They tried to stand him up, but his legs would sink away from him. They sort of helped him up, and carried him to the bottom of the steps. When they went to the bottom of the steps they continued one on each side of him. Then one of the men got on one side with his arm around him, and the other back of him, sort of pushing him, and they took him up about the fifth or sixth step, and after they got him up there they turned around and left him and went down the steps. Mr. Black sort of balanced himself there, just a minute, and then fell completely backward. He turned a complete somersault, and struck on the back of his head. The railroad men just had time to get down to the foot of the steps. There was a railing that led up those steps and the steps were about 10 feet wide. Mr. Black was upon the right-hand side, going up, and he was left right near the railing. When he fell he did not seize hold of anything. His arms were at his side."

On this testimony the jury might find that the plaintiff was so intoxicated as to be incapable of standing, or walking, or caring for himself in any way, and that the defendant's servants, knowing his condition, left him near the top of the steps, where they knew, or ought to have known, that he was in great danger of falling and being seriously injured. They were under no obligation to remove him from the car, or to provide for his safety after he left the car. But they voluntarily undertook to help him from the car, and they were bound to use ordinary care in what they did that might affect his safety. Not only in the act of removal, but in the place where they left him, it was their duty to have reasonable regard for his safety in view of his manifest condition. The jury might have found that they were negligent in leaving him on the steps where a fall would be likely to do him much harm. Moody v. Boston & M. R. Co. 189 Mass. 277, 75 N. E. 631.

The defense rests principally upon the fact that the plaintiff was intoxicated, and was incapable of caring for himself after he was taken from the train, and therefore was not in the exercise of due care. If his voluntary intoxication was a direct and proximate cause of the injury, he cannot recover. The plaintiff contends that it was not a cause, but a mere condition, well known to the defendant's servants, and that their act was the direct and proximate cause of the injury, with which no other act or omission had any causal connection. The distinction here referred to is well recognized in law. Negligence of a plaintiff at the time of an injury caused by the negligence of another is no bar to his recovery from the other, unless it was a direct, contributing cause to the injury, as distinguished from a mere condition, in the absence of which the injury would not have occurred. This is pointed out in Steele v. Burkhardt, 104 Mass. 59, 6 Am. Rep. 191, and Murphy v. Deane, 101 Mass. 455, 3 Am. Rep. 390. It is also considered at some length in Newcomb v. Boston Protective Department, 146 Mass. 590, 4 Am. St. Rep. 354, 16 N. E. 555. See also Marble v. Ross, 124 Mass. 44; Spofford v. Harlow, 3 Allen, 176; Hall v. Ripley, 119 Mass. 135; Stone v. Boston & A. R. Co. 171 Mass. 536-544, 41 L.R.A. 794, 51 N. E. 1.

The application of this rule sometimes gives rise to difficult questions. But in this connection the doctrine has been established that, when the plaintiff's negligence or wrongdoing has placed his person or property in a dangerous situation which is beyond his immediate control, and the defendant, having full knowledge of the dangerous situation, and full opportunity, by the exercise of reasonable care, to avoid any injury, nevertheless causes an injury, he is liable for the injury. This is because the plaintiff's former negligence is only remotely connected with the accident, while the defendant's conduct is the sole, direct, and proximate cause of it. The principle was recognized by Mr. Justice Wells in Murphy v. Deane, supra, in these words: "The last part of the instructions prayed for suggests another question which, in certain conditions of facts, may require care and consideration; to wit: How far the obligations and liabilities of one party are modified towards the other, after knowledge of a negligent exposure by the latter, to danger from the acts or neglect of the former. In such case, what would otherwise have been mere negligence may become wilful or wanton wrong, or may take the place of the sole, direct, or proximate cause, the negligence of the other party being then regarded as a remote, and not a contributory, cause." In Hibbard v. Thompson, 109 Mass. 286, we find this language: "A physician may be called to prescribe for cases which originated in the carelessness of the patient, and, though such carelessness would remotely contribute to the injury sued for, it would not relieve the physician from liability for his distinct negligence and the separate injury occasioned thereby. . . . In such cases the plaintiff's fault does not directly contribute to produce the injury sued for." So in Pierce v. Cunard S. S. Co. 153 Mass. 87, 26 N. E. 416, this court said: "But here the ground is not the fire, but an act done by the defendant after Pierce had got into the dangerous position. . . . The plaintiff's previous negligence is not a sufficient excuse for knowingly inflicting an injury upon him, or, short of that, for omitting the use of such care as is reasonable under the circumstances, to avoid injuring him, even when the harm is not expected in terms."

The rule applies, in like manner, where the plaintiff's act is illegal as distinguished from negligent, so that the defendant's liability is only for wanton and reckless conduct to the plaintiff's injury. McKeon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 183 Mass. 271, 97 Am. St. Rep. 437, 67 N. E. 329; Palmer v. Gordon, 173 Mass. 410, 73 Am. St. Rep. 302, 53 N. E. 909; Lovett v. Salem & S. D. R. Co. 9 Allen, 557-563. In this latter class of cases, where the negligence is wanton and reckless to such a degree as to be in its nature a wilful wrong, it is held that, although the plaintiff makes an averment of due care on his part, this means only due care in reference to the direct and proximate cause of the injury, and, such a gross wrong of the defendant being shown to be the cause, it prima facie so far excludes participation in it by the plaintiff as to relieve him from the necessity of offering affirmative evidence of his care. Aiken v. Holyoke Street R. Co. 184 Mass. 269, 68 N. E. 238; Bjornquist v. Boston & A. R. Co. 185 Mass. 130, 102 Am. St. Rep. 332, 70 N. E. 53; Banks v. Braman, 188 Mass. 367, 74 N. E. 594. The fundamental principle is the same in both classes of cases. It is that the plaintiff's condition, resulting from his prior negligence or wrong, is not a direct and proximate cause of the latter injury, inflicted by one who acts independently, with knowledge of this condition and in reference to it. The principle has been generally recognized, both in England and America. Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 546; Radley v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 1 App. Cas. 754; Inland & Seaboard Coasting Co. v. Tolson, 139 U. S. 551, 35 L. ed. 270, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 653; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Martin, 131 Ala. 269, 30 So. 827; Green v. Los Angeles Terminal R. Co. 143 Cal. 31-41, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68, 76 Pac. 719; Isbell v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 27 Conn. 393, 71 Am. Dec. 78; Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. Wright, 22 Ind. 376; Keefe v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 92 Iowa, 182, 54 Am. St. Rep. 542, 60 N. W. 503; Atwood v. Bangor, O. & O. T. R. Co. 91 Me. 399, 40 Atl. 67; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 33 Md. 542; Buxton v. Ainsworth, 138 Mich. 532, 101 N. W. 817; Rawitz v. St. Paul City R. Co. 93 Minn. 84, 100 N. W. 664; State v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 52 N. H. 528; Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Kassen, 49 Ohio St. 230, 16 L.R.A. 674, 31 N. E. 282; Willey v. Boston & M. R. Co. 72 Vt. 120, 47 Atl. 398; Richmond Traction Co. v. Martin, 102 Va. 209, 45 S. E. 886; Bostwick v. Minneapolis & P. R. Co. 2 N. D. 440, 51 N. W. 781.

The rule has often been applied in favor of plaintiffs whose intoxication prevented them from using care to protect themselves from the consequences of a subsequent act of negligence of another person, done with knowledge of their intoxication. Wheeler v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 70 N. H. 607, 54 L.R.A. 955, 50 Atl. 103; McKean v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 61 Md. 154; Fox v. Michigan C. R. Co. 138 Mich. 433, 68 L.R.A. 336, 101 N. W. 624; Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Cooper, 120 Ind. 469, 6 L.R.A. 241, 16 Am. St. Rep. 334, 22 N. E. 340.

The question that we have been discussing was not considered in Holland v. West End Street R. Co. 155 Mass. 387, 29 N. E. 622. It does not appear that there was evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant in that case, or that anything was done in reference to the plaintiff with knowledge of his intoxication.

Hudson v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 185 Mass. 510, 71 N. E. 66, is not at variance with this rule. In that case it was held by a majority of the court that the rule applicable to a suit brought by one injured by a wanton and reckless act of negligence of another, which permits him to recover without affirmative evidence to sustain his averment that he was in the exercise of due care, is inapplicable to an action for death caused by such an act, brought under Rev. Laws, chap. 111, § 267. The decision rests upon the construction of the words "due care," used in that statute.

We are of opinion that the jury in the present case might have found that the plaintiff was free from any negligence that was a direct and proximate cause of the injury.

Exceptions sustained.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISVILLE CITY RAILWAY COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.
MAUD HUDGINS.

(— Ky. —, 98 S. W. 275.)

Street car—alighting from car—injury.

1. That a passenger alighting from a street car and passing back of it to cross the street is negligent in stepping upon the parallel track without looking for an ap-

Note.—This case furnishes another illustration of a recent tendency on the part of the courts to permit a recovery where one is injured by a street car, run at an excessive speed and without a proper lookout, through a city street, notwithstanding the negligence of the person injured. In In- proaching car does not relieve the street car company from liability for injuries inflicted by such car, if those in charge of it, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have discovered the peril and prevented the injury. Same—control of car.

2. The motorman in charge of a car approaching one discharging passengers at a street crossing is bound to keep a sharp lookout for passengers who may attempt to cross the tracks behind the standing car and have his car under such control that he can stop it at a moment's warning upon the appearance of danger.

(December 12, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, First Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Kidd, ante, —, the decision in favor of the person injured was expressly referred to the doctrine of last clear chance. The difficulty of upholding a recovery in such a case under that doctrine is pointed out in the note to that case and in the note to Dyerson v. Union P. R. Co. ante, 132. For aught that appears, the plaintiff in LOUISVILLE CITY R. CO. v. HUDGINS could, if she had kept a proper lookout for cars, have avoided the danger the instant before she was struck. Assuming, therefore, as the court does, that she was guilty of negligence in the first instance, it is not apparent why that negligence did not continue up to the very instant of the accident, and if so she, and not the motorman, would seem to have had the last clear chance to avoid the accident, or at least their negligence would seem to have been concurrent up to the very instant of the accident. According to the position taken in Dyerson v. Union P. R. Co. and the note to that case, either alternative would be fatal to the application of the doctrine of last clear chance in her favor. It will be observed that the court, in LOUISVILLE CITY R. CO. v. HUDGINS, does not expressly refer the decision to this doctrine. In effect this decision seems to involve a partial revival of the doctrine of comparative negligence which formerly prevailed to some extent, but which is now, in form at least, very generally repudiated. The distinction between the doctrine of comparative negligence and the doctrine of last clear chance is that the former weighs in the balance the comparative negligence of the two parties, and in some cases, when the defendant's outweighs the plaintiff's, permits a recovery notwithstanding that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, i. e., that negligence constituting one of the proximate causes of the injury, whereas the doctrine of last clear chance does not permit a recovery in spite of contributory negligence, but regards the antecedent negligence of the juries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Chesley H. Searcy for appellee.

Carroll, C., filed the following opinion:

The appellee, a passenger on one of appellant's cars going west, got off at Twenty-second street and Portland avenue, on the north side of the street, and, after alighting, passed behind the car for the purpose of go-plaintiff merely as a remote cause or a condition, and not a proximate cause, of the injury, if for any reason it ceased or was interrupted before the termination of the defendant's negligence. Had the condition in the case at bar been such that, after plaintiff, by her own negligence, had placed herself in a position of peril, she could not escape therefrom even by the exercise of due care, and, being in that situation, might have been saved by the exercise of due care on the part of the motorman, a clear case would have been made out for the application of the doctrine of last clear chance. Upon the facts as they appear, however, it would seem that her negligence in failing to discover the car, and the motorman's negligence in running the car at a dangerous speed and in failing to keep a proper lookout, were concurrent up to the very instant of the accident, so that the only ground for permitting a recovery seems to lie in the difference of degree or quality of the concurrent negligence of the respective parties; and to permit a recovery on this ground logically involves the application of the doctrine of comparative negligence, although, as already said, this doctrine has been formally repudiated in most jurisdictions. The questions of negligence and contributory negligence in case of injury under circumstances like those that appear in LOUISVILLE CITY R. CO. v. HUDGINS are discussed in a case note in 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 729. The HUDGINS CASE, however, is of special interest, not because of its holding with respect to the duty of the respective parties in the premises, but because of its decision that the conceded negligence of the plaintiff did not prevent a recovery on account of the conceded negligence of the defendant. Of course, if the court had, as perhaps it might have done, acquitted the plaintiff of all negligence under the circumstances, there would have been no difficulty in permitting her to recover.

ing to the south side. As she was crossing the south track a car on this track, going east, struck and seriously injured her. From a judgment and verdict in her favor, this appeal is prosecuted.

The negligence complained of as stated in the petition is that the east-bound car was running at a high and dangerous rate of speed, and, without warning to appellee, ran into and against her, and that her injuries were caused by the carelessness and negligence of appellant, its servants, and agents, in failing to give warning of the approach of the car to the crossing, and in operating and managing the car in a careless and negligent manner.

The chief, and in fact only, ground of complaint is alleged error of the court in the qualification of discovered peril added to instruction No. 2, which reads as follows: "It was the duty of plaintiff when she started across the tracks of the defendant at the place mentioned in the petition to exercise ordinary care for her own safety, and, if you shall believe from the evidence that at that time she failed to exercise ordinary care for her own safety, and, by reason of such failure, she helped to cause or bring about the injury of which she complains, and that she would not have been injured but for her failure in that respect, if any there was, then the law is for the defendant, and you should so find, unless you shall believe from the evidence that the employees of the defendant on its east-bound car could have seen the plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care when she came in peril from the car, and, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have prevented the injury which the plaintiff alleges she sustained; if they could, then the law is for the plaintiff, and you should so find." To understand the pertinency of the objection to this instruction, it will be necessary to state the substance of the evidence. There are two street-car tracks at Twenty-second street and Portland avenue. These tracks are 4 feet 6 inches apart, and, when the cars on each track are opposite to each other, there is a space of about 2 feet between them. The west-bound cars occupy the north track, and cars going east the south track. The car from which appellee alighted stopped at the usual place for the purpose of allowing her to alight. She got off of the rear platform on the north side of the car, and, as her home was on the south side of the street, she immediately turned and walked behind the car for the purpose of crossing the street, and in doing so, stepped on the east-bound track. There is some conflict in the testimony as to whether she was struck by the east-bound car when she had crossed the first or the second rail, but when struck she was on the track, and there is evidence tending to establish that the east-bound car was running at a high rate of speed, that the gong or bell was not being sounded, that appellee was knocked about 20 feet, that the car ran 100 feet before being stopped, and that the motorman at the time appellee was struck was looking back at some ladies standing in a door on the side of the street, and that appellee did not see or hear the approaching car when she stepped on the east-bound track. The evidence for appellant was to the effect that the gong was being sounded, that the car was under good control, and running at a low rate of speed, and the motorman keeping a sharp lookout, his testimony being that the west-bound car prevented him from seeing the appellee until she stepped on the track immediately in front of his car, and too late to enable him to stop before striking her.

Some eyewitnesses to the injury testified that the west-bound car had just started when appellee was struck; others, that the car had gone about 10 feet. It was plainly the duty of the servants of appellant in charge of the east-bound car to have it under perfect control, to sound the gong, and run at a slower rate of speed when approaching the car that was standing on an adjacent track for the purpose of permitting passengers to alight. Where there is a double track the street cars in use are usually so constructed or arranged that passengers can only alight from the side of the rear platform that is farthest from the other track, and, if they desire to cross the street, it is usual and customary to do so immediately behind the car from which they have alighted, as the cars stop to discharge passengers at the street crossings, and, while going behind the car for the purpose of crossing the street, their view of a car approaching on the other track in an opposite direction is obstructed, nor can the person in charge of the car see them until they get from behind the car from which they have alighted, and, when they do so, they are necessarily either on or in dangerous proximity to the track upon which the other car is approaching. When a car has been stopped at the usual place for discharging passengers, it is the duty of those in charge of an approaching car on the other track to have it under such control that it may be stopped at a moment's notice, so that persons who have alighted may cross the track safely. It is manifestly dangerous, while passengers are alighting from a car, to permit another car, not under perfect control, to run by it on the adjacent track, as the motorman cannot discover the peril of the person attempting to cross the track in time to prevent injury, and it must be anticipated that persons who have alighted from a standing car at a street crossing may cross the street immediately behind it. It is said that it is the duty of the passenger, after alighting from a street car, to stand in the street until the car has gone a sufficient distance to enable him to see an approaching car, and to allow persons in charge of the approaching car to discover them; in other words, that it is the duty of passengers to exercise ordinary care for his own safety. That is true, but the passenger is not to be charged with negligence because he fails to anticipate that the company from whose car he has just alighted will place him in imminent peril from another car before he has had opportunity to reach a place of safety. The duty that persons operating street cars owe to passengers does not end immediately when the passenger has stepped safely to the ground. They are required to, and should, exercise ordinary care to prevent injury by their cars to persons who have left the car while they are attempting to reach the street or a place of safety. It was, of course, the duty of appellee, when she started to cross the tracks, to exercise ordinary care for her own safety, but, although she failed to do this and her failure may have contributed to such an extent to bring about the injury of which she complains that it would not have happened except for her failure to exercise this degree of care, will not relieve the appellant of liability if the persons in charge of the car that struck her could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered the peril appellee was in, and, by the exercise of ordinary care, have prevented the injury to her. It was the duty of the motorman in charge of the car at this point and place to keep a sharp lookout for persons alighting from the car, and who might be expected to cross the street immediately behind it, and to have his car under such control that he might stop it at a moment's warning; and it is manifest that, if the motorman had exercised this degree of care, he could and should have discovered the appellee's peril in time to have prevented injuring her. It was therefore entirely proper, under the facts of this case to qualify the instruction as to contributory neglect, as was done.

The rule herein expressed as to the duty that street car companies owe to protect their passengers from being injured by cars on a track adjacent to the one from which they have alighted has been applied in substance and effect by the supreme court of Illinois in Chicago City R. Co. v. Robinson, 127 Ill. 9, 4 L.R.A. 126, 11 Am. St. Rep. 87, 18 N. E. 772, where the court held that, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"where street-car tracks are in close proximity, to run a car or train of cars in one direction at rapid speed and without signal or warning, over a sidewalk crossing while a car or train bound in the opposite direction is discharging passengers at such crossing, and where, as in this case, the view of the approaching train is obstructed by the standing car from which the person injured has just alighted, is surely conduct which fairly tends to prove culpable negligence, even though the rate of speed of such approaching train does not exceed that which is permitted by ordinance."

Perceiving no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

RICHMOND CEMETERY COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.

JOHN M. WALKER et al.

(— Ky. —, 97 S. W. 34.)

Cemetery—race exclusion.

A cemetery company controlled by white persons cannot, by purchasing land surrounding a lot owned by a colored person, prevent his using his property for burial purposes, or compel him to sell it.

Case Note.—Forbidding burial of negro in cemetery controlled by white persons:

—The case in hand, in holding that no supposed considerations of public policy will warrant the courts in preventing the exercise by a negro of his right to use for burial purposes a lot in a cemetery intended for the use of white persons, is in line with the decision in Mt. Moriah Cemetery Asso. v. Com. 81 Pa. 235, 22 Am. Rep. 743 (Affirming 10 Phila. 385), in which it was held that, where one had purchased a lot in a cemetery without any restriction on his right of sepulture, the managers of the cemetery association had no power afterward to abridge such right by any unreasonable limitation thereon; and that, where the right of interment of another person was ordered by such purchaser, and was refused solely on the ground that the body was that of a colored man, it was held that the right of interment would be enforced by mandamus.

But where a restriction is attached at the time of their sale, against the use of cemetery lots for the interment of colored persons, it would seem, in view of the character of the estate or property acquired by the purchaser of such a lot (as to which see note in 67 L.R.A. 118), that such restriction might be valid.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Madison County in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to prevent interference by defendant with the use of plaintiffs' lot for burial purposes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. H. Breck for appellant.

Messrs. J. A. Sullivan and Grant E. Lilly for appellees.

Nunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, the Richmond Cemetery Company, was organized in 1856, and purchased a tract of land located on the south side of Main street in Richmond, Kentucky, in the shape of a parallelogram, containing 18 acres. South of this 18-acre tract of land, and adjoining same, were 10 acres, formerly the property of Joel J. Walker. These 10 acres were also in the shape of a parallelogram. On October 23, 1877, Joel J. Walker, in consideration of $1 cash in hand paid, and the natural love and affection which he bore for the children of his deceased brother, Owen Walker, conveyed to the children this 10 acres of ground. The deed from Joel J. Walker to the children contained the following reservation, viz.: "Out of this conveyance the grantor reserves a lot on the cemetery line opposite the lot of Jas. Hagen, fronting the cemetery 33 feet, and running back on parallel lines 25 feet." In the month of February, 1882, Joel J. Walker died testate. In his will he devised this lot, with other property, to a former servant, Mary Jane, who had never left him, and her children, naming them. In the year 1885 the appellant company purchased this 10 acres of land from the children of Owen Walker. In the conveyance made by the children to it, the same reservation was made as in the deed from Joel J. Walker to the children. After its purchase of the 10 acres it removed the fence that was situated along the line between the two pieces of land, and inclosed the whole. In the month of December, 1903, a child of John Morgan Walker died, and the grave was dug upon the small lot above described, for the purpose of burying the child, when, it was alleged, the appellant did wilfully and wrongfully refuse to permit him and his friends to enter the cemetery for the purpose stated, and they were compelled to bury it in a lot belonging to a colored man, in the old part of the cemetery. This John Morgan Walker was a son of Mary Jane, and was one of the children named in the will of Joel J. Walker.

The appellees, by this action, sought to compel the appellant to permit the burial of this child on the lot reserved and described above, and to prevent it in the future from 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

interfering with the burial of the persons named in the will of Joel J. Walker, on this lot. The appellant answered the petition. A demurrer was filed to it and sustained. It refused to plead further, and the court granted to the appellees the relief sought. The substance of the answer was that the cemetery of the appellant was for the burial of white persons, and that colored persons were not allowed to be buried in it; and that it had purchased $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres of ground on the opposite side of the city and donated it to the colored people in which to bury their dead, and it had offered to pay, and was willing to pay, the devisees of Joel J. Walker a full price for this plot of ground.

The appellant does not present a single legal reason why the judgment of the lower court should be reversed. Its theory and theme is one of sentiment,—that the peace and good order of the community require that the two races have separate burial places; that this is the policy of the state, as shown by it requiring separate coaches on railroads, and separate schools for the white and colored people. This was accomplished by statutes, but the general assembly has never enacted any statute requiring separate burial places for the two races, and this court is powerless to prevent any person, either white or black, from any legitimate and legal use of his property, and it has no power to force him to accept any price that may be offered for his property.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hardin County directing payment of certain notes out of the estate of Mary F. Sullivan, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. M. Payton for appellants.

Messrs. Sprigg & Holbert for appellees.

Hobson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mary F. Sullivan died a resident of Hardin county, leaving surviving her ten children, and this suit was brought by her administrator for the settlement of her estate. The only question arising upon the appeal is as to the validity of three notes executed by her to three of her younger children, Thomas D. Sullivan, Samuel I. Sullivan, and Katie M. Pierce. These notes are as follows:

For value received I promise to pay Thomas D. Sullivan five hundred ($500) dollars due twelve months after date, but if same is not paid by me no interest is to be collected until after my death. This is not an advancement made by me but money due my sions, the weight of authority at the present time has established as a general rule of law that one cannot make his own promissory note the subject of a gift to such an extent that it can be enforced by the donee against the donor in the latter's lifetime, or against his estate after his death. That the donor and donee occupy the relation of parent and child does not alter this rule; in other words, love and affection are not sufficient consideration to support a promissory note. Upon this proposition almost all the authorities are in accord with SULLIVAN v. SULLIVAN.

Accordingly, in Blanchard v. Williamson, 70 Ill. 652, the promissory note of a mother to her daughter was held not to be valid as a gift inter vivos. The relationship of the parties was not considered, the court announcing the rule that when one delivers his own promissory note as a gift, it is merely a voluntary promise to pay a sum of money at a future day, and cannot be enforced either against the maker in his lifetime, or against his estate after his death, since there is no consideration to support it.

And in Arnold v. Franklin, 3 Ill. App. 141, a father's note to his daughter was held to have been executed and delivered without a valuable consideration, and to be incapable of supporting an action, either at law, or in equity, where it appeared that the note was executed and delivered to her as a present, because the father had no cash on hand to gratify his desire to make his daughter a gift of money.

The leading case upon the proposition under consideration is Parish v. Stone, 14 Pick. 198, 25 Am. Dec. 378, in which a son brought suit upon a promissory note executed to him by his deceased father, payable in one year after the latter's death. It appeared that the note was given during the maker's last illness for the purpose of compensating the son for services previously rendered at the father's request, and for the further purpose of more effectually equalizing the distribution of the father's estate among his children than was done by his will, then previously executed, and which was afterwards established. But there was nothing to show any agreement of the father and son, or any act or declaration of the former, as to what portion of the note was intended as a compensation for services, and what portion to equalize the distribution of the property. The opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Shaw, who considered the case from three points of view. In the first place it was held that the note, like any other contract to pay money founded upon no other consideration than that of equalizing the distribution of one's estate after death, was merely gratuitous, and therefore nudum pactum, given upon no sufficient legal consideration, and incapable of supporting an action or of founding a legal claim. The next question considered was whether the note could be deemed good as a gift causa mortis, and the court held that the donor's own promissory note, payable to the donee, could not be the subject of such a donation. "It was not an existing, available promissory note to anyone; it was not a chose in action. . . . It was not a binding contract by the promisor to the promisee; and, if it were, it would be open to another objection as a donatio causa mortis, namely, that it would not be revocable by the donor. It was simply a promise to pay money, and as such, and as a gift of a sum of money, it wants the essential requisite of an actual delivery." As to the third question, whether, as there was legal and valuable consideration to some extent in services performed at the father's request, and the promise was entire, the note might not be supported upon that ground, it was held that, where the note was given, not upon any one consideration going to the whole note at the time it was made, but for two distinct, independent considerations, each going to a distinct portion of the note, and one was a valid and sufficient consideration to support a contract, and the other not, there the contract should be apportioned, and the holder should recover to the extent of the valid consideration, and no further.

son for services and kindness rendered me by him. This September 25, 1896.

Mary F. Sullivan.

For value received of him I this day promise to pay my son Samuel I. Sullivan five hundred ($500) dollars to be paid him out of my estate before it is divided among my other children. This note is not to bear interest until my death. Dec. 20, 1901.

Mary F. Sullivan.

For value received I this day promise to pay to my daughter Katie M. Pierce five hundred ($500) dollars to be paid out of my estate before it is divided among the other children. This note is not to bear interest until my death. Aug. 28, 1902.

Mary F. Sullivan.

This last proposition find further support in Shotwell v. Struble, 21 N. J. Eq. 31, which was a bill in equity by a widow, who was also the administratrix of her intestate, praying, among other things, for a discovery of the consideration of a note executed by the deceased to his daughter, upon which the latter had brought a suit at law against her father's estate. The answer stated that certain lands had descended to the daughter from her deceased mother, and that her father, being only tenant by curtesy, had conveyed the same in fee, and had given her this note for her release of her estate therein to his grantee. It was held that an offer by a father to give his daughter a note if she would release lands worth only a portion of the sum for which the note ran could not be deemed a contract to give that amount for the lands; that the natural legal construction of such offer was that the note beyond the value of the lands was intended as a gift or advancement; and the court intimated that the note might be good to the amount of the value of the daughter's interest in such lands only, and invalid as to the residue.

Again, in Sanborn v. Sanborn, 65 N. H. 172, 18 Atl. 233, the promissory note of a father to his son was held not to be good as a gift causa mortis. It was also held that the note could not operate as a bequest, because not executed in compliance with the statute of wills. From the statement of facts in this case, it would seem that there might have been a question whether the note, even if otherwise enforceable, was ever delivered in a legal sense. The court, however, did not pass upon that point.

So, a father's promissory notes to three of his children, executed as mere expressions of his bounty and intended to operate as testamentary acts, cannot be held valid as gifts. Smith v. Smith, 30 N. J. Eq. 564.

And in Fink v. Cox, 18 Johns. 145, 9 Am. Dec. 191, a father's note to his son was held to be without sufficient consideration, where it appeared that he executed it as an

The proof shows that Thomas D. Sullivan was a bachelor, living with his mother when the note to him was executed, and cropping the farm on which she lived as her tenant. She made an arrangement with him by which he was to stay with her and take care of her as long as she lived, and, in consideration of his promise to do this, she executed the note to him. Shortly after the execution of the note, however, he married. His wife and his mother did not get along together, and about the year 1898 he left her. They then had some disagreement as to whether he should give up the note, and had, or tried to have, an arbitration about it; but he did not give it up. Afterwards the mother executed to Samuel I. Sullivan and Katie M. Pierce the other two notes as advancements. These notes the old lady declared were executed absolute gift to his son, alleging that this son was not so wealthy as his brother, that he had met with losses, and that he and his brother had had a controversy; and the son himself testified that the note was freely given to him by his father, and was founded on the consideration of natural love and affection. See also Hadley v. Reed, 34 N. Y. S. R. 949, 12 N. Y. Supp. 163, in which Fink v. Cox was followed and natural love and affection held not to constitute a sufficient consideration to support a promissory note given by a mother to her daughter.

And in Craig v. Craig, 3 Barb. Ch. 116, involving a note made by a father to his son, the court said that the weight of authority was against the principle that the donor's own note, merely creating a debt against himself, could be the proper subject of a gift causa mortis. It was further held that, in any event, there was not sufficient delivery of the note in question to support a gift causa mortis.

And in Starr v. Starr, 9 Ohio St. 74, the court below was of the opinion that natural love and affection and a desire on the part of a father to provide for and advance his daughter were not a good and sufficient consideration to validate his promissory note to her. Upon the affirmance of this judgment, the supreme court said: "The note . . . was a gift, and its delivery was the delivery of a promise only, and not of the thing promised. The promise being unfulfilled at the death of the maker of the note, the gift failed. And, as the promise was without consideration and could not have been enforced against the maker in his lifetime, it cannot be against his executor."

To the same effect is Priester v. Priester, Rich. Eq. Cas. 26, 23 Am. Dec. 191, in which it was held that the consideration of love and affection was not sufficient to validate the promissory notes of a father to his children, intended to equalize the distribution of his estate after his death. It was also held that they were void as gifts causa because they had received this much less than the other children and she wished them made up equal. The circuit court enforced the notes, and the administrator of the estate appeals.

The administrator introduced Joel Jackson and proposed to prove by him that he was one of the arbitrators selected by Mrs. Sullivan and her son Thomas, and that Thomas D. Sullivan told him then that he held the $500 note, but was not entitled to retain it, because he had not done what he agreed to do as the consideration of the note, which was that he was to live with his mother and support her during the remainder of her life. This evidence should have been admitted. While a proposition of compromise passing between the parties themselves may not be proved, statements that either of the parties may make to an arbitrator may be given in evidence, just as any other admission against interest may be. There was no consideration for this note, except the services of Thomas D. Sullivan, and in lieu of the instructions which the court gave he should have instructed the jury to whom the case was submitted for trial that, if they believed from the evidence the note was given in consideration of services rendered or to be rendered by Thomas D. Sullivan, and he failed to carry out the contract and render the services contracted for, they should find for him the fair value of the services actually rendered, the amount so found to be in the same proportion to the full amount of the note as the services which he rendered bore to the full amount of the mortis. To quote from the opinion: "The subject of the gift was a void promise to pay after the death of the donor,—a thing having neither form, shape, nor legal existence, incapable of actual delivery or passing by delivery. It could not revert to the donor because the gift was, by the terms, not to take effect until after his death."

And in Shugart v. Shugart, 111 Tenn. 179, 102 Am. St. Rep. 777, 76 S. W. 821, in which actions were brought by children against their father upon his promissory notes executed to them to secure them the amount called for out of his estate, in addition to their share therein, in case of his sudden death, and which were to take effect only in case of his death, the notes were held unenforceable, because "the gift, if it can be so called," was based wholly and solely upon love and affection.

So, in Holley v. Adams, 16 Vt. 206, 42 Am. Dec. 508, it was held that a note from a father to his daughter was void for the want of sufficient consideration, and that it could not be sustained as a gift causa mortis, since a mere promise to pay a sum of money could not be a gift of this nature. Here it appeared that the note had been executed and delivered by the father in his last sickness, and was as follows: "For value received, and for the consideration of love and affection that I have towards . . . [my daughter], I promise and agree that she shall have and receive out of my estate $1,400, to be paid . . . after my decease."

And in Smith v. Kittridge, 21 Vt. 238, it was held that the love and affection of a father for his sons could not be deemed sufficient consideration to make his promissory note to the sons a valid obligation against the maker or his estate, either at law or in equity; and that it could not be a gift causa mortis, as it was merely the donor's written promise that he would give at some future time, and, in order to be available to the donee, required the interposition of law to enforce it.

Nor can a father's promissory note to his son as the latter's share in the father's estate be enforced against the maker's estate by one who, with a knowledge of the facts, accepted the same from the son after the death of the father, as such an instrument is but a promise to make a gift in the future, and is therefore without consideration. Conrad v. Manning, 125 Mich. 77, 83 N. W. 1038.

Ricketts v. Scothorn, 57 Neb. 51, 42 L.R.A. 794, 73 Am. St. Rep. 491, 77 N. W. 365, is worthy of attention here, though the note in question was executed to a granddaughter, and the case finally went off upon the sufficiency of the consideration rather than the necessity thereof, and is, therefore, not strictly within the scope of this note. It appeared that the grandfather delivered the note, which was payable on demand, with interest, to his granddaughter without making any condition, requirement, or request of her,—in short, as a gratuity,—and looked for nothing in return, though he said to her at the time of its delivery that she would not have to work any more, and she had in fact ceased work for a time. It was held that the note was given without any valuable consideration, as it was "nothing more than a promise to make a gift in the future of a sum of money therein named." But the court further held that all the elements of an equitable estoppel had been established, and that the grandfather's legal representatives could not be permitted to resist payment of the note on the ground of lack of consideration, since it was the grandfather's suggestion that caused his granddaughter to abandon her employment and to rely upon the bounty he had promised her, and such action on her part had been contemplated by him as the probable consequence of the execution of the note.

And it would seem that a parent may, by will, direct that his note to his child be paid, and in this way effectuate his purpose to make the child a gift. In Loring v. Sumner, 23 Pick. 98, the plaintiff sued upon a note executed to him by his father, payable one year after the maker's death, and also count-services he agreed to render under the contract with his mother.

As to the other two notes, a different question is presented. The proof taken on the trial is not sufficient to show that Samuel I. Sullivan or Katie M. Pierce in fact received $500 less than the other children. In that event the notes would not be material. The notes executed to them are on their face testamentary dispositions of the estate. The language of both notes is the same, and while each contains a promise to pay they both provide that the $500 is to be paid out of the estate before it is divided among the other children and is not to bear interest until her death. A testamentary disposition of the estate can only be made by will executed as provided by the statute and regularly admitted to probate. These papers are not so executed that they may be probated as a will under the statute. A person may, by will, dispose of his estate, and thus regulate the matter of advancements between the children, whether the advancements have in fact been made or not. But, if a person dies intestate, then the question of advancements is regulated by the statute (Ky. Stat. 1903, § 1407), and the declaration or intention of the parent cannot control the fact. Shawhan v. Shawhan, 10 Bush, 600. In Chitty on Contracts, p. 27, after a quotation from Blackstone as to what is a sufficient consideration for a deed, it is added: "We must observe, however, that the term 'good consideration,' as thus used in the case of deeds, does not apply to ed upon a legacy under the father's will as follows: "I have given to my son . . . $1,000 by note for his full part of my estate. . . . I also order my executor to pay all the legacies above named. I, . . . being of sound mind and disposing memory, see fit to dispose of my estate as mentioned in the above will." The court followed Parish v. Stone, 14 Pick. 198, 25 Am. Dec. 378, as to the count on the note, and held it to be nudum pactum, but allowed a recovery under the will upon the ground that it was clear that the testator intended that his executor should pay the son's note. To quote from the opinion: "I will that a certain note be paid or that a certain promise be performed" would be a valid legacy of the amount of the note, or of the thing promised to be done, although the note or promise were invalid. It seems to us that the language of this will is equivalent to saying 'I will that this note of $1,000, given to . . . [my son] be paid.' And we can entertain no doubt that such would be a valid legacy."

In Pennsylvania the law is settled that the sealed note of a parent to a child is valid, in the absence, of course, of fraud or other defenses of that nature. Accordingly, in Mack's Appeal, 68 Pa. 231, in which it appeared that a mother, for the purpose of equalizing her estate among all her children, executed her notes under seal, payable upon her death, to some of her children, the notes were upheld upon the ground that the mother had the same power to provide for the equalization of her estate among her children in this manner as by will. The court deemed no consideration necessary because the seal imported it, and cited authorities to sustain the propositions that a voluntary bond was, both in equity and at law, a gift of money, and that, though a parol, unexecuted promise without consideration to make a gift inter vivos would be void, an agreement under seal to do so could be enforced. To quote from the opinion: "A man may give a present bond to pay a sum of money at his death, and a delivery of it to the obligee renders it perfect as a present ent obligation though payable at a subsequent, whether a fixed or an uncertain, period, to be afterwards ascertained and made certain. It is strictly debitum in presenti solvendum in futuro, and is as irrevocable as any other obligation under seal which in law imports consideration."

That this is the rule in Maryland, also, was intimated in Selby v. Case, 87 Md. 459, 30 Atl. 1041, which was a bill in equity by a son for the sale of his deceased mother's real estate to pay her debts, his purpose being to raise sufficient funds to discharge two notes under seal, executed and delivered to him by his mother, "of her own free will and accord, simply with the desire of benefiting him." The court was of the opinion that a judgment might have been obtained at law on the notes because they were under seal, but refused to grant the relief sought upon the ground that a court of equity would not enforce an executory contract which was merely voluntary and not founded on a valuable consideration really and actually existent.

And in Shotwell v. Struble, 21 N. J. Eq. 31, in which it further appeared that the daughter had also sued on a sealed bill of her father for the same amount as his note, and in which the mother sought, also, for a discovery of the consideration of the bill, the court held that the latter was entitled to such relief, but intimated that, if the bill was obtained legally and without fraud, although without consideration, the daughter would be entitled to recover upon it, but that in such case it was an advancement by the father, and must be brought into hotchpot before the distribution of the personal estate.

As has already been remarked, there are some earlier cases that support the proposition that one may make his own promissory note the subject of a gift inter vivos, notably Woodbridge v. Spooner, 1 Chitty, 661, and Bowers v. Hurd, 10 Mass. 427. All these cases apparently proceeded upon the theory that the maker of a promissory note could simple contracts, to support which mere relationship or natural love and affection is not a sufficient consideration." In 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 179, the rule is thus stated: "A valuable consideration is necessary to support any contract, and the rule makes no exception as to the character of the consideration respecting negotiable instruments when the consideration is open to inquiry. Therefore a consideration founded on mere love and affection, or gratitude, is not sufficient to sustain a suit on a bill or note; as, for instance, when a bill or note is accepted or made by a parent in favor of a child, or vice versa, it could not be enforced between the original parties, the engagement being gratuitous upon what is called a good, in contradistinction to a valuable, consideration." In Ewards on Bills, Notes, and Negotiable Instruments, § 456, it is said: "The consideration of blood, or natural love and affection, is sufficient in a deed, against all persons but creditors and bona fide purchasers; and yet there is no case where a personal action has been founded on an executory contract, where a consideration was necessary, in which the consideration of blood, or natural love and affection, has been held sufficient." See, to same effect, Story, Promissory Notes, § 183; Richardson v. Richardson, 148 Ill. 563, 26 L.R.A. 305, 36 N. E. 608; Phelps v. Phelps, 28 Barb. 121; Holley v. Adams, 16 Vt. 206, 42 Am. Dec. 508; Flint v. Pattee, 33 N. H. 520, 66 Am. Dec. 742; Parish v. Stone, 14 Pick. 198, 25 Am.

not impeach the same by showing that there was a total lack of consideration to support it, but was limited to the defense of failure or illegality of consideration. The cases just reviewed, however, clearly show that such is no longer the law, even in the case of a note from a parent to a child. But in Seton v. Seton, 2 Bro. Ch. 610, which was a bill in equity upon a promissory note executed to a trustee by a mother for the benefit of her unborn child, filed by the child and the trustee to establish the note together with the trust declared therein, and to have the same realized upon the proceeds invested, Lord Thurlow overruled a general demurrer upon the ground that he could not undertake to say that a promissory note given by a woman to a trustee for her child was nudum pactum.

There are, too, some dicta to the effect that the relationship of parent and child is of itself sufficient to support a promissory note not under seal from the parent to the child. In Ross's Appeal, 127 Pa. 4. 17 Atl. 682, where a man, on the eve of his second marriage, signed, sealed, and delivered a note to his mother in trust for the three children of his first marriage, it was held to be a binding obligation which could be recovered against his estate; an adjudication to be expected in view of the law in that state with respect to seals, as above shown. But in the opinion of the court below, whose judgment was affirmed by the supreme court without opinion, the following language is found: "A seal imports a consideration, but there is here a good consideration in the natural affection of a father for his children and his obligation to provide for them. The note was not placed in escrow, but was delivered to the payee named therein. It passed wholly and unconditionally out of his control and into the custody and control of the payee. . . . [The father] himself recognized this fact, and during his life conferred with his mother in regard to the note, the proper time for its payment, and the division of the money among the beneficiaries. There is no room upon this state of the facts to hold this note to be an unexecuted gift."

And in Doty v. Dickey (Ky.) 96 S. W. 544, which was an opinion rendered five months after SULLIVAN v. SULLIVAN, and by the same tribunal, the court, in passing upon the question of the validity of an assignment of an insurance policy made to the insured by his wife and children, the beneficiaries therein, used the following language: "In this state love and affection growing out of the relationship of parent and child is a good consideration, and sufficient to uphold not only an executed, but an executory, contract between them;" citing in support of this proposition several Kentucky cases, which, however, upon perusal, are found to be far from establishing the assertion of the court, as far as an executory contract is concerned, since all the contracts sued upon were under seal, or the agreement was shown to have been made upon other considerations than that of love and affection, though in Mark v. Clark, 11 B. Mon. 44, the court said that the affection of a father to his son or daughter had been held to be sufficient consideration to make enforceable a note to pay a sum of money for the purpose of equalizing the estate of the maker. But no authority is cited in support of this proposition, and the question in that case was whether the consideration of love and affection was sufficient to support a bond executed by an uncle to a niece binding himself to pay her a sum of money in three annual instalments, which question the court decided in the negative.

In Foster v. Walker, 32 N. S. 156, the promissory notes of a father to his child were held not to be valid as gifts either inter vivos or causa mortis, solely upon the ground that there had been no actual delivery thereof to the donees. The question here under consideration, whether such a note could be the subject of a gift, was not considered by any of the judges, all of whom seemed to think that the question of their validity or invalidity turned entirely upon their delivery or nondelivery to the donees.

Dec. 378; Fink v. Cox, 18 Johns. 145, 9 Am. Dec. 191.

None of the Kentucky cases relied on are in point. It is true a note may be made payable at death, but it must be upon a valid consideration. A note may be delivered as a gift causa mortis, but these notes were not so delivered. In Reynolds v. Reynolds, 92 Ky. 556, 18 S. W. 517, the money belonged to the mother, and was in effect borrowed by the father, who executed his note to the daughter for it. The consideration there for the note was the money which belonged to the mother, and which the father retained upon his promise to pay it to the daughter. In Fain v. Turner, 96 Ky. 634, 29 S. W. 628, the note of the mother was based upon the consideration that the child forebore to bring a suit and thus lost a right of action which she had. In Graves v. Graves, 7 B. Mon. 213, the promise of each of the children was a sufficient consideration to support the promise of the other. The case of Jennings v. Anderson, 4 T. B. Mon. 445, rests upon the idea that the instrument was an acknowledgment of a marriage portion. In Mark v. Clark, 11 B. Mon. 44, the instrument sued on was not held enforceable. To uphold notes such as these would be to establish a very dangerous doctrine, and those who have access to the old would be given a great advantage over their brothers and sisters who are at a distance. All the salutary checks which the law has thrown around the disposition of property by will would be dispensed with; for no attesting witness is necessary to a note, and it may be obtained when no one is present to testify to the circumstances of its execution. Many old people may be induced to give a note payable out of their estate at their death, when they would not make a gift of the money if they had it, and would be unwilling to make a will so devising their estates. We therefore conclude that the two notes to Samuel I. Sullivan and Katie M. Pierce are, under the evidence, without consideration and unenforceable, and that the court should have instructed the jury peremptorily to so find.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

PETER C. SCHMIDT

v.

NEW ORLEANS RAILWAYS COMPANY.
Appt.

(116 La. 311, 40 So. 714.)

Street railway—act of servant—liability.

1. The defendant railway company, by its act of incorporation, came under certain legal obligations for the safety and protection of the public, and particularly of its passengers. It had for that purpose to act through its employees, for whose acts it was responsible. The conductor of a street car represents the street railway company. The company cannot free itself from the obligations referred to by failing to give its conductors full and specific instructions, or by restricting the limit and extent of their authority, so as to disable them from properly performing duties which it is inherently necessary and essential they should have to carry out to the extent of legal requirements of the functions of the positions in which they are placed. It cannot, by merely enjoining upon the conductors to perform their duties cautiously, prudently, and well, break the effect of their failure to comply with these instructions; nor can it, by throwing the instructions into the form of prohibitory orders, alter the legal scope of their powers, duties, and authority. These are matters which it cannot lessen and make to fall below the limit of authority affixed by the law to the positions themselves.

Same—wrongful arrest.

2. The conductor of a street car invited a police officer to come upon his car, saying there was a pickpocket upon it. After he entered the conductor pointed out to him one of the passengers on the car as being such. The policeman arrested the passenger, took him off the car short of his destination, marched him under arrest through a crowded street, and sent him in a patrol wagon to a police station, where he was detained several hours and then released without any charge having been preferred

Headnotes by NICHOLLS, J.

Case Note.—Liability of carrier for wrongful arrest of passenger by servant:

—In considering the liability of a master, other than a carrier, for a wrongful arrest by his servant, the question to be determined is: Was the servant, at the time of making the arrest, acting within the scope of his authority, was he acting as the servant of his master, or as an individual merely? If he acted within the scope of his authority, express or implied, the master is liable. In case of arrest by a servant of a common carrier, however, other considerations may enter into the determination of the carrier's liability. If a passenger on a railroad train is wrongfully arrested during the course of his transportation by the servants of the carrier intrusted with the performance of the contract of carriage, the weight of authority seems to hold the master to a much stricter rule of liability than that applied to other cases of wrongful arrest, since such an arrest is regarded as a breach of the carrier's contract safely to transport the passenger. Because of this special duty of protection which the contract of carriage is deemed to impose upon the carrier, it has been declared that the real against him. He was shown to be a man of good character and position.

Same—liability of company.

3. The conductor did not himself make the arrest, but it was through his instrumentality that the passenger was arrested and ejected from the car and taken to the station. The conduct and course pursued by the policeman was the direct and natural consequence of that of the conductor. Under the Civil Code, he who causes another person to do an unlawful act, or assists or encourages the commission of it, is answerable in solido with that person for the damage occasioned by that act.

(January 15, 1906.)

test of the carrier's liability is, not whether the servant making the arrest acted within the scope of his authority, but whether there has been a breach of the carrier's contract safely to transport the passenger. This seems to be the better rule by which to determine the carrier's liability and it is believed to be sustained by the weight of authority, though there are not wanting cases that apply the ordinary rule under such circumstances. Whether or not this special rule of liability is applicable in all its strictness to street railway companies is not so clear, but the tendency of the cases is to attribute to the conductors of street cars implied authority so broad as to include within its scope practically any wrongful act toward a passenger committed during the actual course of the transportation.

If an arrest takes place before the actual carriage of the passenger has commenced, or after it has ceased, the usual rule of respondere superior is generally applied, and the liability of the carrier made to depend upon the extent of the servant's authority and the facts and circumstances of each particular case. The early cases, especially in England, were much more strict in their construction of the servant's authority, and much more favorable to the carrier, than the later ones, which show a tendency to broaden the rule of liability in favor of the passenger. Indeed, some of the late cases go so far as to deny the distinction referred to above, between an arrest made on the train and one made before the carriage has commenced, or after its completion.

In the early case of Roe v. Birkenhead, L. & C. Junction R. Co. 7 Exch. 36. which was an action of trespass for assault and false imprisonment, where it appeared that the plaintiff was wrongfully taken into custody, after completing his journey, by some of the servants of the railway company, on the charge of not having paid his fare, and, after being detained some time, obtained his liberty by paying the fare demanded, a nonsuit was ordered on the ground that the arrest was not authorized by the company. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) brought to recover damages for false arrest. Affirmed.

Statement by Nicholls, J.:

The plaintiff prays for a judgment in his favor against the defendant for this: That the New Orleans Railways Company is a corporation doing business in this city as operator of street cars.

That on February 15, 1904, between the hours of 10 and half past 10 o'clock p. m., he was a passenger on car No. 253 of the Clio street line of cars operated by the defendant corporation then in charge of conductor Jules Mossy; that petitioner had paid his fare on entering the car at the intersection of Royal and Orleans streets and was peaceably riding on said car to his intended destination, namely, 2230 Clio

The court said that the general rule is that a master is not liable for the tortious act of his servant, unless that act is done by an authority, express or implied, given him for that purpose by the master; that, if it had appeared in this case that the act complained of was one that the company had legal authority to perform, the act would not have been tortious, and it might well have been put to the jury as having been done by an authority given by the company; but that there was no evidence that the act was of that character, and it therefore followed that the plaintiff was bound to show, not only that the person by whom he was arrested was a servant of the company, but also that he had its authority to arrest him.

And in Poulton v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 2 Q. B. 534, it was held that where a station master arrested a railway passenger in charge of a horse at the end of the journey for not paying for the transportation of the horse, he exceeded his authority, and the company was not responsible, on the ground that the railway company itself could not lawfully arrest a person for non-payment of a horse's transportation, but could only detain the horse, and that, therefore, it could not authorize its servant to do so.

So, a railway ticket agent was held, in Allen v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 65, to have no implied authority to cause the arrest of a person whom he suspected of an attempt to rob the till after such attempt had ceased, and the company was held not liable for his act. Blackburn, J., in this case, said that he was inclined to think that, if a man in charge of a till were to find that a person was attempting to rob it, and he could not prevent him from stealing the property otherwise than by taking him into custody, the person in charge of the till might have an implied authority to arrest the offender, or, if the clerk had reason to believe that the money had been actually stolen, and he could get it back by taking the thief into custody, and he took him into custody with a view of recovering the prop street, when, at the intersection of Canal and Royal streets, the said conductor, Jules Mossy, while acting as the agent of the defendant corporation and within the scope of his employment, and with the intention of carrying out the instructions given him by said defendant corporation and its officers or agents superior to him, and of performing his duty of protecting the passengers on said car, as he thought, did call police officer Methe and two other police officers of the local police force, who entered from the rear and front of said car, and then and there, in the presence of a car load of passengers, unceremoniously and without reason or cause did eject petitioner from said car and order said police officers to remove petitioner from said car and arrest him as a pickpocket.

That the said conductor, in the presence of all the passengers, charged petitioner with being one of the pickpockets who escaped from his car a few evenings before, and, by persisting in the statement and not permitting petitioner to explain that he (the conductor) was making a mistake, and by instructing said police officers to arrest petitioner as the pickpocket who had escaped from his car, humiliated petitioner.

That thereupon, at the instance of said conductor, whilst acting as aforesaid, he was removed from the car (although his intended destination was 2230 Clio street, though he remonstrated), and was walked through Royal street from Canal to Customhouse, now called Iberville, street, followed by a large and inquisitive gathering, to the patrol box at the corner of Iberville street and Exerty taken away, it might be that that also might be within the authority of a person in charge of a till; but that there is a marked distinction between an act done for the purpose of protecting the property by preventing a felony or of recovering it back, and an act done for the purpose of punishing the offender for that which has already been done; that there is no implied authority in a person having the custody of property to take such steps as he thinks fit to punish a person who, he supposes, has done something with reference to the property which he has not done; that the act of punishing the offender is not anything done with reference to the property, but is done merely for the purpose of vindicating justice that, if the law were that defendants were responsible in this case for the act of their clerk in giving the plaintiff into custody on an unfounded charge, every shop keeper in London would be answerable for any act done by a shopman left in his shop who chose to accuse a person of having attempted to plunder the shop; every merchant would be responsible for a similar act of his clerk, and every gentleman for the act of his butler or coachman.

So strict were the early English cases in limiting the carrier's liability that liability was denied in one case even though the passenger was forcibly ejected from the car and then arrested, on the ground that the carrier's servants exceeded their authority. Eastern Counties R. Co. v. Broom, 6 Exch. 314, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 196, infra.

But in Goff v. Great Northern R. Co. 3 El. & El. 672, where a passenger, at the end of his journey, was wrongfully arrested by the direction of the superintendent of the line, on the charge of not paying his fare; and, under the railway act, a penalty was imposed on any person traveling on a railway without having paid his fare, with intent to avoid payment thereof; and all officers and servants of the company were empowered to apprehend such person,—it was held that the company was liable, on the ground that, since it must naturally have been expected that the exigency of deciding whether or not a particular passenger should be arrested would be likely to arise, it was to be reasonably inferred that the company would have at its stations officers with authority to make such decision; and that the conduct of the defendant's agents in referring the matter to the superintendent of the line was sufficient evidence to go to the jury that he was an officer having authority to act for the company in arresting the plaintiff.

This case was cited as controlling authority in Moore v. Metropolitan R. Co. L. R. 8 Q. B. 36, a case almost identical in its facts and in which the court follows the same line of reasoning. It was argued in this case that, unless the passenger had really committed the offense denounced by the statute, the officer in charge of the station had no authority from the company to give the passenger into custody; but the court well said that, if this were so, there would never be an action against a railway company for false imprisonment. The court distinguished the case of Poulton v. London & S. W. R. Co. supra, on the ground that there the station master had given the passenger into custody on a charge which would not have justified the company itself in arresting him, and that therefore the authority of the railway officials to decide what should be done on the exigency of the moment did not arise.

The appointment of one as cashier at a railway station, with power to collect money, give receipts, sell tickets, take care of the money received, and forward it to the treasurer of the company, was held, in Daniel v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 130 N. C. 517, 67 L.R.A. 455, 48 S. E. 816, not to empower him to arrest persons whom he suspected of having stolen money which had come into his possession, so as to render the railroad company liable in case he caused the arrest of an innocent person. The court in this case said: "A servant intrusted with his master's goods may do what is necessary to preserve and protect them, because change alley, where he was compelled to stand and be gazed upon and inquired about by a large gathering of citizens until the arrival of the police-patrol wagon, when he was ignominiously placed in said wagon like a common felon, in the presence of the aforesaid gathering, amongst which were many of his acquaintances, and driven to the third precinct police station, when, after being questioned by the captain in charge, and upon the remonstrance and representations of several of his friends who had witnessed the outrages heaped upon him, and who followed him to the station house to protest against such treatment, he was allowed to depart without even a charge being preferred against him.

That all this happened on the night before Mardi Gras just after the Proteus parade, at a time when both Canal and Royal streets, as well as Iberville street and Exchange alley, were unusually crowded with residents of and visitors to the city; and that a vast throng witnessed his arrest, greatly to his chagrin and humiliation, and that the mental agony and mental and bodily suffering of petitioner whilst being escorted by the police officers through the streets as a pick-pocket were indescribable, and that he was equally tortured and humiliated by the gross, wanton, and uncalled for insult and abuse heaped upon him as aforesaid by said conductor whilst acting within the scope of his duties and instructions, on said car, as the agent of said defendant corporation.

That he has made amicable demand upon said defendant corporation for reparation and for the amount herein sued for as dam-his authority to do so is clearly implied by the nature of the service; but, when the property has been taken from his custody, or stolen, and the crime has already been committed, it cannot be said that a criminal prosecution is necessary for its preservation or protection. This may lead to the punishment of the thief or the trespasser, but it certainly will not restore the property, or tend in any degree to preserve or protect it. It is an act clearly without the scope of the agency, and cannot possibly be brought within the limits of the implied authority of the agent."

And a railroad ticket agent who takes a bill believing it to be a counterfeit, in payment for tickets, and immediately procures the arrest of the person from whom he takes it, is held, in Mulligan v. New York & R. B. R. Co. 129 N. Y. 506, 14 L.R.A. 791, 26 Am. St. Rep. 539, 29 N. E. 952, not to be acting within the scope of his business, so as to make the railroad company liable for false imprisonment, although the arrest is wrongful and the bill proves to be a good one. It was also held in this case that an agent whose sole duty is to sell tickets at a railway station is not charged with the protection of passengers waiting for trains, nor intrusted with the execution of the transportation contract, so as to bring the passenger in this case within the protection of the stricter rule of liability, considered later in this note, which is applied where the actual performance of the contract of transportation has commenced. But two of the judges dissented from this view, contending that, the relation of carrier and passenger having been created by the purchase of a ticket, the passenger was just as much entitled to protection against the wrongful acts of the company's servants as if at the time of his arrest he had been in one of its cars.

This case is distinguished in Palmeri v. Manhattan R. Co. 133 N. Y. 261, 16 L.R.A. 136, 28 Am. St. Rep. 632, 30 N. E. 1001, where a ticket agent who followed a woman who had bought a ticket out upon the platform and charged her with giving him counterfeit money, with a demand for other money in its stead, and, on her refusal, angrily insulted her by slandering her character, and put his hand upon her, telling her not to stir until he got a policeman to arrest and search her, but let her go when he failed to get an officer, was held to be acting within the scope of his employment, so as to render the carrier liable for false imprisonment and slander if the detention was unlawful and his charges false. The court said this case was distinguishable from the Mulligan Case, because here the agent was attempting to obtain from the passenger other money in place of that which he thought was counterfeit, and that in doing so he was acting for his employers and with no other conceivable motive, while in the Mulligan Case the agent, instead of refusing the bill which he suspected of being counterfeit, as he should have done, accepted it and gave the change with the ticket and then sent for a police officer; that his duty as the agent of the company was to have refused the bill if he supposed it was not genuine, and that, when he accepted it, his only purpose could have been to further the efforts of the police officers, who, it appeared, had warned him to look out for counterfeit bills of a certain denomination.

The liability of the railroad company was also sustained in Lynch v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 77, 43 Am. Rep. 141, where a passenger purchased a ticket and entered a car, but, before reaching his destination, lost his ticket; and, when he attempted to pass from the station platform through the gate into the street, was prohibited by the gatekeeper and told that he could not pass until he produced a ticket or paid his fare, and he explained that he had paid his fare and lost his ticket, but the gatekeeper pushed him back and refused to let him pass, and then sent for a police officer and ordered his arrest. In this case it appeared that the railroad company had a regulation that at the end of his passage the passenger must produce and deliver up ages, without avail; that he has suffered damages in said sum for injury to his feelings, humiliation, mental and bodily agony, and suffering, loss of reputation and time, and chagrin.

That he was born in New York city twenty-five years ago, and has been a resident of this city continuously for the past eight years; that he has always borne an excellent reputation for honesty and as a respectable and peaceable citizen; that the outrageous treatment to which he has been subjected by reason of the fault of said defendant corporation's agent has preyed upon his mind to such an extent that he has never been the same in health or spirits since the occurrence of the outrage.

a ticket or pay his fare; but the court held that the company had no right to detain and imprison him in case of a refusal to pay fare, and that the gatekeeper clearly acted within the line of his duty; that the rule of the company required passengers to show a ticket or pay their fare at the gate in order to be able to pass out, and that the gatekeeper should not let them go out until they either paid their fare or showed a ticket; that in anything the gatekeeper did he did not act for any purpose of his own, but to discharge what he believed to be his duty to his principal; that it mattered not that he exceeded the powers conferred upon him by his principal, and that he did an act which the principal was not authorized to do, so long as he acted in the line of his duty, or, being engaged in the service of the company, attempted to perform a duty pertaining, or which he believed to pertain, to that service.

This case is distinguished in Corwin v. Long Island R. Co. 2 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 106, in which the liability of the company for the wrongful arrest of a passenger who, because he had lost his ticket, was unable to deliver it to the gateman upon leaving the premises, was denied, where the passenger had succeeded in passing through the gate, and had actually left the railway premises at the time the arrest was made. The court said that in Lynch v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. it appeared that the company's rules required its gatekeepers not to permit passengers to pass out until they had paid their fares or deposited their tickets, and that the gatekeeper, in detaining the plaintiff in that case, was simply doing his duty; that, if the gatekeeper in the present case had unreasonably detained the passenger, and had by force prevented him from passing the gate, and had then and there caused his arrest, the Lynch Case would have been applicable, the act would have been within the scope of the gatekeeper's authority, and the company would have been liable; but that here the passenger was allowed to pass through the gate and to leave the company's grounds, and that when he left the grounds he had ceased to be a 7 L.R.A. In view of the premises, petitioner prays that said New Orleans Railways Company be cited according to law; and that after due proceedings had there be judgment in favor of petitioner and against said New Orleans Railways Company in the full sum of $5,000, with legal interest from judicial demand, for costs and general relief.

Defendant answered, pleading the general issue.

The court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, in the sum of $750, with interest from date of judgment.

Defendant appealed.

Plaintiff answered the appeal, praying for an increase in the judgment to the amount prayed for.

passenger, and the company was no longer liable for his safety; that whatever the servants of the company did after this was not the act of the corporation, but the tortious act of the individual, for which he alone was responsible.

Wrongful arrest of a passenger, at the completion of his journey, on a charge of attempting to pass counterfeit money, procured by a railroad detective employed for the purpose of protecting the property of the company and of ferreting out and prosecuting parties guilty of crimes against the company, was held, in Eichengreen v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 96 Tenn. 229, 31 L.R.A. 702, 54 Am. St. Rep. 833, 34 S. W. 219, to render the company liable, although in this particular matter the detective exceeded his authority and acted contrary to his instructions respecting the caution to be exercised.

So, in Hamel v. Brooklyn & N. Y. Ferry Co. 1 Silv. Sup. Ct. 584, 25 N. Y. S. R. 153, 6 N. Y. Supp. 102, Affirmed in 125 N. Y. 707, 26 N. E. 753, it was held that, if the gateman of a ferry company assaulted an intending passenger who was attempting to pass the gate, and, as a part of that transaction, called in a police officer and had the passenger arrested, the ferry company was liable, whether it authorized the arrest or not.

And a railroad company was held liable for the act of its baggage master, who had been placed in charge of its waiting room, in assisting in the wrongful arrest of a passenger waiting at the station for a train, although the arrest was at the instance of city authorities, and not on behalf of the railroad company, on the ground that it was the duty of the railroad company and its servants to whom the care of passengers was committed to refrain from committing wrongful acts toward them. Texas Midland R. Co. v. Dean, 98 Tex. 517, 70 L.R.A. 943, 85 S. W. 1135. The court said: "It appears that the baggage master was one of the employees selected by the defendant to render services to passengers about the station provided for their use, and that he was present and on duty when the arrest was made. Mr. Harry H. Hall, for appellant:

Appellant's contentions sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. George Montgomery and Albert Guibault, for appellee:

The negligence of the conductor as to any matters involving the safety and security of passengers while being conveyed is the negligence of the railroad company.

The carrier must not only protect its passengers, but, a fortiori, must protect them against the violence and insults of its servants.

such places the passenger is as much entitled to proper treatment and protection as when he is aboard a conveyance, and employees put there to be brought in contact with passengers and to render to them services due to them from the carriers are as fully within the principle stated as are such employees upon trains and vessels. The case is therefore governed by the broad principle deduced from the obligation of the contract, and is not of the class in which a person employed by another for some purpose commits a wrong while he is not engaged in his master's business. One employed as was Barton is engaged in the master's business in respect of the duty of according proper treatment to a passenger when he is on duty in such capacity around such a place. The fact that he is not at the particular time actively doing anything for the carrier does not make conduct on his part violative of the master's obligation any the less attributable to the master."

An act making depot or station agents of railroad companies the conservators of the peace, with authority to preserve order in the waiting rooms, and to arrest and deliver to the custody of the most convenient officer all persons guilty of disorderly conduct, was held, in King v. Illinois C. R. Co. 69 Miss. 245, 10 So. 42, not to make such agents officers of the state and its representatives in the exercise of the powers conferred, so as to relieve their employers from responsibility for a wrongful arrest of a passenger at a station.

And a special policeman appointed for a railroad company by the mayor, who had no legal power to appoint him, was held, in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Galliher, 89 Va. 639, 16 S. E. 935, to be acting within the scope of his authority in wrongfully arresting a passenger in the station before he had obtained his ticket; and the company was held liable therefor. The court, in this case, said that the fact that the arrest was made before the passenger had obtained his ticket was immaterial; that neither the actual purchase of a ticket, nor the entering into a car, is essential to create the relation of 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Lafitte v. New Orleans City & Lake R. Co. 43 La. Ann. 37, 12 L.R.A. 337, 8 So. 701.

Nicholls, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The testimony adduced on the trial of this case established beyond the possibility of a doubt that about 10 o'clock on the night of February 15, 1904, the plaintiff entered on Royal street at the corner of Orleans, as a passenger on car No. 61 of the Clio street line of cars, owned and operated by the defendant company, for the purpose of going to his home on Clio street; that he paid his fare as a passenger; that while thus upon the car he was guilty of no wrong or fault; that when the car reached the corner of Royal and Canal streets a policeman entered the carrier and passenger; that the plaintiff, having come to the station for the purpose of purchasing a ticket and taking the train, was entitled to the courtesy and protection due to a passenger from the moment he entered upon the premises of the company.

In Shea v. Manhattan R. Co. 27 N. Y. S. R. 33, 7 N. Y. Supp. 497, which was an action for false imprisonment by a person who had been arrested while on a railroad platform, by the agent in charge of the platform, it was held that the question whether or not the arrest was justified was properly left to the jury, and a verdict for the plaintiff was sustained, the court saying: "It is the duty of the defendant to treat its passengers with courtesy and kindness, and where one of its employees, while engaged in the business of the company, whether wilfully and maliciously, or in consequence of what he considers a duty, illtreats a passenger so far as to wrongfully cause his arrest, the company is liable for it."

Where the wrongful arrest is made during the actual carriage of a passenger on a railroad, by the servants intrusted with the performance of the contract of carriage, the tendency of the later cases is to hold the carrier to strict accountability for the acts of its servants. It seems to be now pretty well settled that the arrest of a passenger while being transported under the protection of the servants to whom the carrier has delegated the performance of the contract of carriage constitutes, like an assault or a wrongful ejection, a breach of the carrier's contract safely to transport the passenger and to protect him against interference by strangers and the misconduct of the company's employees; and in such cases the carrier is generally held liable regardless of the servants' motives, and even though they acted contrary to instructions. Hutchinson, Carr, 3d ed. § 1100, p. 1286; Gulf. C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Conder, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 488, 58 S. W. 58; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Henry, 55 Kan. 715, 29 L.R.A. 465, 41 Pac. 952; Gillingham v. Ohio River R. Co. 35 W. Va. 588, 14 L.R.A. 798, 29 Am. St. Rep. 827, 14 S. E. 243.

car, arrested him, and took him off the car in the presence of a large number of passengers, placed him under arrest, and, followed by a large crowd, carried him to the corner of Exchange alley and Iberville (Custom-house) streets, from which place the officer sent him in a patrol wagon to the police station, opposite Jackson square, where he remained until 1 o'clock at night. At that time he was released, without any charge being brought against him; it having been shown to the satisfaction of the officers of police that the arrest which had been made was the result of mistaken identity. The plaintiff is shown to have been a man of good character, standing, and position, and was necessarily greatly mortified and humiliated by the treatment he received.

Some cases, indeed, show a tendency to apply this strict rule even when the actual transportation of the passenger has not yet commenced. See Texas Midland R. Co. v. Dean and Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Galligher, supra, and dissenting opinion in Mulligan v. New York & R. B. R. Co. 129 N. Y. 506. 14 L.R.A. 791, 26 Am. St. Rep. 539, 29 N. E. 952.

And the unreasonable refusal of a passenger to state his name when asked by a conductor to whom he tenders a mileage ticket, if the name thereon is his own, is held, in Palmer v. Maine C. R. Co. 92 Me. 399, 44 L.R.A. 673, 69 Am. St. Rep. 513, 42 Atl. 800, not to justify the conductor in procuring his arrest without a warrant on the charge of fraudulently evading payment of fare. In this case no question was raised but that the conductor was acting within the scope of his authority as a servant of the defendant corporation.

That in such cases the question at issue is not the authority of the servant to make the arrest, but whether or not there has been a breach of the carrier's contract to transport safely, is also plainly stated in McLeod v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. 72 App. Div. 116, 76 N. Y. Supp. 347. In this case a railroad detective wrongfully accused a passenger of theft, and searched him, after the passenger had appealed to the conductor for protection and the conductor had refused to interfere; and, although no money was found upon him, the detective took him from the train and had him confined in jail. It was held that it was for the jury to determine whether the act of the detective in removing the passenger from the train, with the conductor's sanction after he was appealed to by the passenger for protection, constituted a violation of the defendant's contract to carry the passenger safely, and that, if the jury so found, then it would follow that for the subsequent arrest and detention the company would be liable. In the lower court the complaint was dismissed on the ground that the detective did not act within the scope of his employment, but on appeal the court 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The occurrence took place on the night before Mardi Gras. At that season the city is filled with strangers seeking pleasure, who are accompanied or followed usually by numbers of thieves and pickpockets endeavoring to take advantage of the crowded streets and cars to ply their illegal practices.

It seems that, upon a report made by the conductor of car No. 61 of the Clio street line to the inspector of the company, Winters, that several evenings before several of these pickpockets had entered upon his car, the inspector called up some of the police officers by telephone, communicated to them the information he had so received, and directed them to place themselves in communication with the conductors; which accordingly they did. Upon the information said that the liability of the carrier was to be determined by another and different principle, viz., whether the damages did or did not result from a breach of the defendant's general duty as a common carrier to convey the passenger safely and without molestation to his destination; that the rule relieving the master from liability for an injury caused by his servant when not acting within the scope of his employment does not apply, even though the injury be maliciously inflicted, as between a common carrier and a passenger; that, regard being had to the obligation imposed upon the defendant of conveying the passenger safely, it was bound, not only to protect him so far as practicable, while being so conveyed, from violence committed by strangers and co-passengers, but it was bound to protect him absolutely against the misconduct of its own servants who were employed to perform its obligation or contract of carriage; that it therefore became immaterial whether the detective or the conductor was acting within the scope of his employment; that, had the detective been an entire stranger, instead of an employee of the road, and had he, with the assent, or by the direction, of the conductor, removed the passenger from the train, the same question would be presented.

In Duggan v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 159 Pa. 248, 39 Am. St. Rep. 672, 28 Atl. 182, where a passenger was wrongfully arrested and taken from the car by police officers, in pursuance of directions sent by telegram by a detective agent of the carrier; and it appeared that the telegram was addressed to the conductor, though it was not delivered to him, but to the baggage master, who summoned the policemen; and there was some evidence that when the policemen entered the car the conductor pointed out this passenger as the man to be arrested.—the court said that the question of the defendant's liability might turn on either of two grounds: First, whether the detective acted as the agent of the carrier in ordering the arrest, and acted within his authority; and, second, whether the carrier was made liable by the action of the conductor. In regard to thus received, Detectives Schultz and Reynolds entered several days later in citizens' dress into the car, and upon a nod from the conductor they arose and went to the front of the car, where several pickpockets who were aboard the car took alarm; one ran to the front platform and jumped over the dashboard, followed by Detective Schultz, who, however, failed to arrest the man.

The arrest made on the night of the 15th of February seems to have been a sequence of that just referred to and of the information of the situation of affairs which had been brought to the notice of the police. When car No. 61 stopped that night at the corner of Royal and Canal streets, there were several policemen standing in the immediate neighborhood, among others policeman Methe, who arrested the plaintiff. The following is his version of what took place: He was stationed at the corner of Royal and Canal streets. "The conductor of car No. 61 of the Clio street line says to me: 'Officer, here's a pickpocket on the car.' I went through the front of the car, and he points the man out. I got the man. I took him out of the car. While I was taking the man out several gentlemen whom I knew by sight said, 'The conductor is mistaken;' and I was in doubts, so I took the man down to Exchange alley and Custom-house street and rang the wagon, and several more gentlemen came there and told me they knew the man; knew him to be a respectable sort of person. So the wagon came, and I did not want to put myself into it. I held the detective, the court held that, if he had general authority, actual or apparent, to act for the company in the capacity of detective officer, and such authority included, expressly or by general usage and consent, the power to make an arrest in its behalf, then the mode of execution of such power, with a warrant or without, was immaterial, and the company was liable in either event. In regard to the conductor, the court said that he had general power and control over the train and all persons on it, with authority to enforce regulations and preserve order, and that those powers involved the correlative duty to protect passengers; that the subject of the illegal arrest was within the general line of his duty, and that if, therefore, he took part in it, the company was liable for the consequences of his act. But it was held that the case must go to the jury to determine what part, if any, the conductor took in the arrest.

In Krullevitz v. Eastern R. Co. 140 Mass. 573, 5 N. E. 500, which was an action for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution because of the act of a railroad conductor in causing the arrest of a passenger on his train on a charge of fraudulently evading payment of fare, the court held that want of probable cause, and malice on the part of the conductor, if established, might be imputed to the carrier.

This strict rule of liability is apparently repudiated, however, in Patterson v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1750, 78 S. W. 870, where the liability of a railroad company for the act of its conductor in causing the wrongful arrest of a passenger on a charge of rape is denied, on the ground that such an act was not within the scope of the conductor's duties, where the arrest had not been instigated or continued by the direction or procurement of the railroad company. The court said that the only connection between the carrier and the alleged injuries to the passenger, attempted to be set out in the petition, was that one of the carrier's conductors set the prosecution on foot by swearing out a warrant for his arrest: adding: "There has been great diversity of opinion as to whether a corporation was liable for damages for the unauthorized malicious acts of its agents, committed in the course of their employment. But in this state the law is well settled that, if the act of the servant was committed in the course of his employment and while acting within the scope of his authority as agent of the corporation, they may be so held; but, so far as we are advised, they have never been held liable for the malicious act of one of their employees which was not committed in the scope of their employment or while acting within the line of their duty to the employer. . . . It cannot for a moment be contended that there was anything in the employment of Morarity as conductor of one of appellee's trains which imposed upon him the duty to swear out warrants for the arrest of persons charged with committing rape." The arrest in this case took place on one of the carrier's trains, and, if the conductor caused the arrest on the charge that the passenger had committed a rape while on the train, it is difficult to understand how it could be said that he was not acting within the scope of his employment; but the facts in this case are not clearly set out, and there is some language in the opinion from which it might be inferred that the rape was not charged to have been committed on the train and that the conductor swore out the warrant before the contract of carriage commenced. In such case there might be ground for holding that his act was in no way connected with the contract of carriage.

The liability of a railroad company for the wrongful arrest of a passenger was also denied in the early English case of Eastern Counties R. Co. v. Broom, 6 Exch. 314, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 196, where the passenger was forcibly ejected from the train and given into custody because of his failure to produce and deliver up his ticket, as required by a by-law of the company providing that each passenger must show his ticket when required by the guard in charge of the train, and deliver it up before leaving the company's premises, on the ground that the man subject to the captain's orders. Captain Walsh, the commander of the precinct, when he got to the station, released the man. . . . The conductor told me there was a pickpocket in the car, and he pointed the man (Mr. Schmidt) out to me and said he was a pickpocket; that's the words he used. He didn't order me to arrest him, but he told me he was a pickpocket, and naturally it was my duty to arrest such people as these. He said: 'It's the same man who jumped off the car a couple of nights before, when Detective Schultz and Reynolds were in the car.' I was near him when he said it. We were right close together. The car was very crowded. This happened inside the car. The attention of the people in the car was attracted to the remark. There was a stampede in the car at the time. Everybody was excited, and everybody wanted to look at him, and naturally a policeman coming in the car made some excitement. There was a crowd in the street when I took Mr. Schmidt off. There was a crowd all night there. . . . When I put my hands on Mr. Schmidt and arrested him he was surprised. He said: 'These people are mistaken; you are making a mistake.' "

The plaintiff Schmidt testified that he rode on the car as far as Canal street, when he was taken off the car by a policeman. There was one at the front door and one at the rear, and they took him off the car. He was wondering why, so he went to the front of the car and asked the conductor why he there was no evidence that the servant had any authority to arrest the passenger, or to enforce the by-law of the company as to the payment of fare.

So, in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Donahoe, 56 Tex. 162, the court said that, as matter of law, it cannot be said that it is within the scope of the power and duty of a conductor, as an agent of the corporation, to cause the arrest of a passenger on the charge of offering counterfeit money in payment of his fare, and to cause the passenger to be confined in jail; that these are questions of fact, to be determined by the jury from the evidence; that if, as matter of fact, the conductor wrongfully expelled the plaintiff in this case from the cars, or procured it to be done by others, or wrongfully prevented him from going on to the point of destination, or procured it to be done by others, the company, as matter of law, would be liable for the actual damages resulting therefrom; also that, if the corporation had expressly empowered or instructed the conductor to institute legal proceedings against passengers, and to cause them to be arrested and confined in prison upon such charges, it would undoubtedly be liable for the acts of the conductor coming within the scope of such authority.

In the case of the arrest of a passenger on a street car, there is more conflict among the decisions. Of course, if the servants in charge of the car have been given authority to arrest when necessary, the company is liable for a wrongful exercise of this power. Ruth v. St. Louis Transit Co. 98 Mo. App. 1. 71 S. W. 1055; Grayson v. St. Louis Transit Co. 100 Mo. App. 60, 71 S. W. 730.

But where the conductor has not been given express authority to arrest, there is some conflict of opinion as to whether the wrongful arrest of a passenger renders the company liable.

The arrest of a street-car passenger at the request of the conductor, on the charge of riding without payment of fare, was held, in Little Rock Traction & Electric Co. v. Walker, 65 Ark. 141, 40 L.R.A. 473, 45 S. W. 57, not to render the carrier liable, where the conductor had been authorized only to put delinquent passengers off the cars. It was held that the conductor had no right to cause the arrest without express authority from the company, though in determining what might be regarded as express authority the court might include not only authority given in express words, but such authority as necessarily followed by implication from the express language conferring the authority.

In Furlong v. South London Tramways Co. 1 Cab. & El. 316, the act of a conductor of a tram car in causing the arrest of a passenger on a charge of attempting to pass counterfeit money was held to be within the scope of his authority, where, under the tramways act, any officer or servant of a tramway company was empowered to detain any person seeking to avoid payment of his fare.

But in the subsequent case of Charleston v. London Tramways Co. 36 Week. Rep. 367, it was held, on the same state of facts, that the tramway act must be construed as meaning any officer or servant appointed for that purpose, and that without some other authority to the conductor the company would not be responsible for his acts.

And the act of a conductor on a street car in causing the arrest of a passenger immediately after ejecting him from the car, on the charge of not having paid his fare, was held, in Lezinsky v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (C. C. App. 2d C.) 31 C. C. A. 573, 59 U. S. App. 588, 88 Fed. 437, not to be within the scope of his authority, so as to charge the company with liability therefor in an action for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment. But here the arrest was made after the passenger had been ejected, and this fact apparently affected the decision, since the court said that for the improper removal from the car the defendant, being a common carrier, would be liable in damages, because the carrier's obligation to transport safely includes the duty of protecting passengers from any injury caused by the act of any subordinate or third person engaged in any part of the put him off. He looked at him awhile and then said: "Ain't you the man who jumped off the dashboard of this car the other night?" It was not long after that the car went off, the policeman took him down to Exchange alley and Customhouse street, and from there took him in the patrol wagon to the station. "The conductor said to the policeman: 'That's the man back there.' The policeman took the man back of me first, and the conductor said: 'Not him; the first one,'"—pointing to Schmidt himself. The policeman then took him off the car, and he walked with the policeman to the front of the car. The conductor was there with the motorman, and he asked him (Schmidt) whether he was not the man who had jumped over the dashboard the other night.

service required by the act of transportation, but that the subsequent act of the conductor in causing the arrest of the passenger was apparently outside of the scope of the conductor's service as such; that it could not be inferred, in the absence of testimony, that it was in the course of the employment of the conductor of a street cable car to cause the immediate arrest of a former passenger for his conduct in refusing to pay fare or leave the car, and thus take the risk of being compelled to leave his car in the street temporarily unprovided with a conductor. The facts in this case might be sufficient, perhaps, to take the case out of the rule which is believed to govern in case of the arrest of a passenger while actually being transported, and bring it within the ordinary rule of respondet superior, which is generally held to apply in case of an arrest before the commencement, or after the termination, of the transportation.

So, in Lafitte v. New Orleans City & Lake R. Co. 43 La. Ann. 34, 12 L.R.A. 337, 8 So. 701, the liability of a street railway company for damages for malicious prosecution and false arrest was denied, where it appeared that the driver of a car accused a passenger of giving him a counterfeit coin, and threatened to have him arrested when he reached the station, and did cause the arrest to be made when the station was reached, just as the passenger was stepping from the car, on the ground that, in instigating the arrest, the driver was not exercising the functions for which he was employed; the court saying that he had no instructions to make arrests for the passing of counterfeit money, and that no inference of such authority could be drawn from the fact of changing money for passengers. The court also said that the company had no interest in the arrest of a person attempting to pass counterfeit money, as it appeared that, if counterfeit money was accepted by the driver, he would be charged with it and the company would lose nothing. But it was held that the company was liable for the abuse and defamation of the passenger while on board the company's car. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

There was a large crowd there. The attention of the passengers was attracted to the excitement. They saw the arrest. The whole crowd saw the conductor point him out to the policeman. The conductor said to the policeman: "Detective Schultz will know him."

The evidence shows that the officer Methe took plaintiff out of the rear end of the car and took him on the outside to the front of the car.

Mr. Abraham Beer testified that he was, at the time of the occurrence, at the corner of Royal street. He saw a car come up there and stop; the conductor saying that Mr. Schmidt was a pickpocket. "I heard him tell that to somebody, I saw the conductor tell the policeman, 'That's the man,'

And in Cummingham v. Seattle Electric R. & Power Co. 3 Wash. 471, 28 Pac. 745, where, as a passenger on a street car was being ejected by the conductor, a policeman inquired what he had been doing, and, upon the conductor replying that he was disorderly, the policeman arrested him; but the conductor refused to make a charge against him when subsequently requested by the policeman,—the court said that it was not alleged or contended that it was within the scope of the conductor's authority, confided to him by his principal, to cause the arrest, and that it was not shown that the company adopted the action of the conductor, or knew of the arrest, until after the passenger's discharge; that, under such a state of facts, it could not be held liable for the arrest, even though it had been procured by the conductor, which was doubtful.

And in Central R. Co. v. Brewer, 78 Md. 394, 27 L.R.A. 63, 28 Atl. 615, where the superintendent of a street railway company caused the arrest of a passenger after he had left the car, on the ground of placing a counterfeit coin in the fare box, he was held to have no implied authority to make the arrest, so as to render the company liable therefor. The court here said that, in consequence of the fact that a corporation must of necessity act through its agents, courts have almost invariably held that, to hold a corporation liable for a tortious act committed by its agents, the act must be done by its express precedent authority or ratified and adopted by the corporation; that a corporation is not responsible for unauthorized and unlawful acts, even of its officers, though done colore officii; that to fix the liability it must appear, either that the officers were expressly authorized to do the act, or that it was done bona fide in pursuance of a general authority in relation to the subject of it, or that the act was ratified by the corporation.

The distinction between an arrest while the subject thereof still retains his character of passenger and one made after the relation of passenger has ceased is clearly stated in Grayson v. St. Louis Transit Co.

pointing to Mr. Schmidt. Mr. Schmidt and the conductor were on the back platform."

The witness Gillis testified that the policeman, after taking Schmidt from the rear end of the car, brought him to the front to the conductor, who was at that end. Mr. Schmidt wanted to know what was the matter with him, and the conductor said: "Ain't you the man who jumped off the dashboard the other night?" Mr. Schmidt said he was not, and someone (witness did not know who) said: "They will know all right." When Mr. Schmidt was arrested he said he was not guilty of any crime, and would make them pay for putting him to that trouble and disgrace.

100 Mo. App. 60, 71 S. W. 730, which also contains an excellent statement as to the general duties and powers of street-car conductors. In this case the company was held liable for the wrongful act of its conductor in causing the arrest of a passenger while he was in the act of descending from a car, as the act was held to be within the scope of his authority, both under the rules of the company which permitted him to make arrests in proper cases, and on general principles of law. The court said: "The conductor had charge of the car and full control of it for the time, and represented the defendant in the fullest sense as to any and every matter connected with its management and control; and, it being his duty to protect passengers from insult and injury, it cannot be said, as matter of law, that, in the discharge of this duty, he had no authority to call an officer and cause the arrest of a passenger when necessary to preserve the peace on board the car and to protect his passengers from insults and injury. On the contrary, it seems to us that, if a passenger should be guilty of a flagrant breach of the peace to the annoyance and disturbance of his copassengers, the conductor would have the right, and it would be his duty to cause his arrest by an officer if one was by to make it. It is true, he is not a conservator of the peace, yet it is his bounden duty to preserve the peace on his car, and to prevent insult and injury to the passengers; and if, to discharge this duty, it should become necessary to call a policeman, we are satisfied that he should do so, and that to do so is within the scope of his employment. . . . We think that, both from necessity and under the company's rules, it was within the scope of his authority to cause the arrest of any passenger when necessary to preserve the peace and to protect other passengers. After the relation of passenger ceased, of course, the authority of the conductor to cause his arrest ceased, and an arrest caused by him after the passenger had left the car would not be the act of the company, but the act of the conductor, for which he, and not the company, would be liable. . . . The plaintiff had not quit the car when the con-

The defendant placed its inspector, Mr. Winters, on the stand, also Mossy, the conductor of car No. 61, and its second vice president, Joseph H. De Grange.

The former testified that conductor Mossy had made complaint to him of larcenies committed on his car by pickpockets entering the same. He told the conductor he would take the information and give it to the police department. He accordingly rang them up by telephone, and they sent Detectives Schultz and Reynolds over to see him. He told them exactly what the conductor had told him. He told them to go and see the conductor. He did not give any instructions to the conductor or to anyone else to arrest ductor ordered his arrest, but was in the act of alighting from the car, and his testimony is that the order for his arrest was simultaneous with his being pushed from the car by the conductor. The order for his arrest was before he quit the car, and while he was yet under the protection of the conductor, and at a time when it was the duty of that employee to treat him with respect and to protect him from injury and insult. The order for the arrest was therefore given by the conductor while he was about the business of the company, and was within the scope of his authority, though in abuse of it."

And where a conductor on a street car called an officer to arrest a passenger for his refusal to pay a second fare, and the officer refused to make the arrest without a formal charge, and the three thereupon went to the police station, where the conductor made a formal charge against the passenger of disturbing the peace, and the plaintiff was arrested and required to give bond for his appearance, it was held, in Dwyer v. St. Louis Transit Co. 108 Mo. App. 152, 83 S. W. 303, that, although the arrest was not actually made on the car, it was there agreed to and arranged for in the presence of the passenger, and that the transaction was continuous, without intermission, so that the act of the conductor in causing the arrest after leaving the car was done by him while serving his master as conductor, and the company was liable therefor in an action by the passenger for malicious prosecution. The court also said, in reply to the contention that the conductor had no authority to cause an arrest, that, although he had no express authority and no statutory authority was given, yet, independent of any statute on the subject, if authority to call an officer by a conductor was not conceded in an emergency, it would practically put street railway travel in populous cities at the mercy of thieves and thugs; that the official discharge of the conductor's duty to protect his passengers requires that he shall have authority to call an officer when practicable to make an arrest; that to deny him this authority would be to deny him the use of the agencies provided by law the men on the cars. The railway company did not give such instructions. The witness simply reported the matter to the police and left it to them to act. Witness did not tell the conductor to receive instructions from the police. He told him we would give the information to the police. Witness has no right to give instructions to the police department. They thanked him for the information. Witness asked them to go and see the conductor and get from him the information which he himself had received from him. He did this because there had been lots of complaints made in reference to thieves in the cars, and he thought it was no more than right that the company should protect the patrons of the street cars. He considered it was the duty of the company to protect the passengers against pickpockets by giving the information received to the police.

The inspectors were not instructed in particular in all such details, but he considered that the company owed the people of the city, if anything was wrong on the cars, that information should be given to the police. He considered it was part of his duty to give such information to the police.

Mr. De Grange, a vice president of the company, testified that the defendant company had never given any instructions to its conductors or motormen in regard to the to preserve the peace; and therefore that the conductor, when he made the formal charge against the plaintiff to cause his arrest, was acting for the defendant and within the scope of his authority, and the fact that there was no disturbance of the passengers, in fact no disturbance of any kind whatever, did not militate against the authority of the conductor to cause the arrest; that it showed an abuse of that authority, not a lack of it, for, if he was authorized to do the act at all, the master was liable.

So, in Boden v. St. Louis Transit Co. 108 Mo. App. 696, 84 S. W. 181, the liability of a street railway company for a wrongful arrest of a passenger by a conductor was sustained, although the conductor had been given no authority to make arrests.

And it is said in West Chicago Street R. Co. v. Luleich, 85 Ill. App. 643, where the liability of a street car company for an arrest by its conductor of a passenger on a charge of having used counterfeit money in payment of fare was sustained, in answer to the contention that the arrest was outside the scope of the conductor's duty, that the defendant, as a common carrier of passengers, had power to expel from its trains persons who were disorderly and persons who refused to pay their fares; that it could exercise this power only by an agent, who was usually, if not uniformly, its conductor; that it therefore authorized the conductor to exercise the power, and that in doing so the conductor must necessarily act in accordance with his own judgment; that, in legal contemplation, the corporation was present and acting in the person of its conductor.

Again, in Corbett v. Twenty-Third Street R. Co. 42 Hun, 587, a street railway company was held liable for a wrongful arrest of a passenger made at the instance of the driver of the car, under whose management the car was, the court saying that, as the driver removed the plaintiff from the car and placed him in the custody of the officer under the authority conferred upon him for the management of the car by the company, the latter became legally liable to the plaintiff for the damages to which he was subjected, since the law is well settled that a railroad company is liable to the same extent as an individual, for any injury done to a passenger by a person in the course of his employment, who is in the service of the company.

In Rown v. Christopher & T. Street R. Co. 34 Hun, 471, it was also held that the act of a street-car conductor in causing the arrest of a passenger, upon a controversy arising as to whether or not he paid his fare, was within the apparent scope of his authority, and that the company was liable therefor where the arrest was wrongful. As to the authority of the conductor to cause the arrest of the plaintiff, the court held there could be no serious doubt, since the conductor said that the plaintiff not only resisted the attempt to remove him from the car, but used profane and abusive language and conducted himself in a disorderly manner, and that that charge, under N. Y. Laws 1880, chap. 186, would justify not only his removal from the car, but, in addition, his arrest and confinement by the officer. The court held, therefore, that the conductor's conduct was consequently within the limits of his authority, and that the company could not exonerate itself from liability because it had not, as matter of fact, delegated this particular authority to the driver; that he had it by virtue of his position, and could exercise it within the scope of his employment whenever a state of facts arose indicating to him that it was the proper course to be followed.

In Barry v. Third Ave. R. Co. 51 App. Div. 385, 64 N. Y. Supp. 615, where the plaintiff, while a passenger on a street car, was wrongfully arrested at the instance of the conductor and taken before a justice, but, no complaint being made, was discharged; and he subsequently brought an action against the company for malicious prosecution,—the court held that, no judicial proceeding having been begun, the essential element of an action of malicious prosecution was wanting, and that therefore the complaint must be dismissed. But the court added that the plaintiff's remedy was an action for false imprisonment.

arrest of the suspected people on their cars. On the contrary, they were forbidden to do any police duty.

If the conductor and motorman on this or any other car caused the arrest of a suspected person, they would have been unauthorized to do so by the company. They would have done it in direct disobedience of orders, because they have no police powers and are not authorized to make any arrests. When there are suspected persons operating on the cars, the company, for the purpose of protecting its patrons, notifies the police, calls their attention that such information had reached them, and asks them to do whatever they see fit to do. He did not consider it was one of the duties of his company to protect its passengers against loss through manipulations of pickpockets on the cars. The company protected them as well as it possibly could. It was the duty of the conductor to see that passengers reached their destination safely, as far as they possibly could; but there were a great many contingencies that they were unable to control.

Detectives Schultz and Reynolds were placed upon the stand. They testified to the fact that they had received information from Mr. Winters, the inspector of the defendant company, that conductor Mossy had made a report to him that there were pickpockets working on his car, and he referred them to the conductor. They called upon the latter on his car and were told by him about it. They testified in reference to the occurrence on that car when one of the pickpockets jumped over the dashboard of the car and escaped. They asked the conductor, on that occasion, if he saw any of the pickpockets that he knew, to give them a little tip on the quiet. There was an agreement with him that he should notify them when these parties whom he took to be pickpockets would get on his cars. On that particular occasion, when the car got near Poydras street, the conductor nodded to them. Immediately several men ran out of the car and escaped, as before stated. They instructed the conductor to point out thereafter to the police any of those people.

Mossy testified to the same prior facts which the detectives have testified to. Touching the arrest of Mr. Schmidt, he said that he did not know him, but thought when he came on the car that he had seen him on the car with the three pickpockets who had escaped several nights before, and that he was one of them. He testified that on the night of plaintiff's arrest his car was "jammed" with people, and he asked the police corporal whether there were any detectives around, and he answered: "No; why?" And he (witness) said to him: "I think I have one of the thieves on the car. I would like you to put a detective on the car." The first thing, he opens the gate, walks in, and he says: "Is this one of the men?" Witness said, "I think so," and "he lugged the man off." Witness asked for a detective to watch the man. His purpose was to have the detective watch him and see if he did anything. He did not tell the policeman to arrest him. He had never received any instructions from inspector Winters or any other of the officers of the company to make any arrest or cause the arrest of anybody on the car. He never gave any instruction to arrest anyone. Witness simply asked the police if there was a detective there in citizen's clothes, so he might get on the car and see if the man he suspected did anything wrong.

Mr. Schmidt resembled one of the men from the size and everything else. He denied positively having pointed out Mr. Schmidt to the policeman, saying, "Officer, here is a pickpocket in the car;" denied having made the statement that "Mr. Schultz would know;" denied having asked Mr. Schmidt whether "he was not one of the men who had jumped off the car," or having spoken to him at all; denied having been at the front end of the car at all; denied having seen the officer arrest Mr. Schmidt. It was the police corporal who arrested him, not officer Methé.

In the brief filed on behalf of the defendant it is urged that "the master is never liable for the wilful and malicious acts of the servant, committed outside of the scope of his employment. On such a state of facts, therefore, a master cannot be held responsible where the servant makes or causes a false arrest or false imprisonment," citing 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. We do not think that the conductor was, in this case, malicious. On the contrary, though acting erroneously, carelessly, and to the great injury of the plaintiff, his acts were in the line of the discharge of his duty to his employers and in their supposed interest, and not his own. The railway company, by reason of its act of incorporation, came under certain obligations for the safety and protection of the public, and particularly of its passengers; and it had for that purpose to act through employees, for whose acts in that regard it assumed responsibility.

The conductor of the street car represented in this instance the street railway company. The company could not free itself from the obligations referred to by failing to give its conductors full and proper instructions, or by restricting the limit and extent of their authority so as to disable them from properly performing duties which it was inherently necessary and essential they should have in order to carry out to the extent of legal requirements the functions of the position in which they were placed. It could not, by merely enjoining upon the conductors to perform their duties cautiously, prudently, and well, break the effect of their failure to comply with these injunctions, nor could it, by throwing its instructions in the form of prohibitory orders, alter the legal scope of their power, duties, and authority.

These are matters which it cannot lessen and make to fall below the limits affixed to the positions themselves by operations of the law itself.

The conductor in the case before us did not himself arrest the plaintiff, but it was through his instrumentality that the latter was arrested in, and ejected from, the car in which he was a passenger, by a policeman, and taken to the police station through the streets in a patrol wagon as a prisoner. The conduct of the policeman was the direct and natural consequence of the course pursued by the conductor. Article 2324 of the Civil Code declares that he who causes another person to do an unlawful act, or assists or encourages in the commission of it, is answerable in solido with that person for the damage occasioned by that act. It was held in Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 524, 24 L. R.A. 483, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440, 34 N. E. 506, 35 N. E. 1, that, where a person selected and paid by the proprietor of a theater is, at the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

request of the latter, appointed a special policeman for that theater, and, under the direction of the proprietor's ticket agent, makes a wrongful arrest, the proprietor will be liable.

We do not underrate the difficulties in which railroad companies are placed by the heavy responsibilities thrown upon them by the law, but these responsibilities they voluntarily assume as being compensated by the privileges conferred by the state. Being assumed, they must be met.

We are of the opinion that the judgment appealed from is correct, and it is hereby affirmed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

CHARLES R. SCHIRM. Appt.,

v.

LEOPOLD H. WIEMAN.

(103 Md. 541, 63 Atl. 1056.)

Stolen property—payment for recovery—validity.

One who, to secure the money with which to procure the return of stolen property, is obliged to indorse the check of the owner, may, if he is compelled to make good the amount upon the owner's stopping payment of the check, recover the sum so paid from the owner, since the payment of money to secure the return of stolen property violates no rule of law and such a transaction is therefore legal and binding.

Case Note.—Legality of contract to pay thief for return of stolen property:—

A search of the authorities has failed to disclose any other case upon the question as to the legality of a contract by which the owner pays, or agrees to pay, the thief, or one acting in his interest, for the return of stolen property, when unconnected with any attempt to compound a felony or to prevent the apprehension and conviction of the thief, although, as shown in the opinion, there are a number of cases upholding the legality of contracts for the payment to the owner of the value of the stolen property.

In Worthen v. Thompson, 64 Ark. 151, 15 S. W. 192, it was held that a promise by one in possession of stolen property to surrender it to its owner, being an undertaking to do only what the law exacts, was not a consideration that would support the owner's promise to pay money therefor.

In Morgan v. Hodges, 89 Mich. 404, 15 L.R.A. 438, 50 N. W. 876, it was held that an agreement by the owner of stolen property to permit the bona fide purchaser to

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court of Baltimore City in defendant's favor in an action brought to enforce his liability upon a check payment of which he had stopped after plaintiff had, by indorsement, become liable for money advanced on it. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Cookman Boyd, for appellant:

It was not illegal for Mr. Wieman to endeavor to secure the return of his watch, even by paying to have it returned, provided he did not thereby compound a felony.

The cashing of the check by Schirm for Wieman was at most a collateral undertaking for which Wieman would be liable.

Schirm having parted with his money at Wieman's request, and Wieman having thereby obtained his watch, he ought not to be permitted, when the transaction was over and completed, at this eleventh hour, to disavow his contract with Schirm, who acted in good faith.

Read v. Anderson, L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 779; Hieronimus v. Sweeney, 83 Md. 159, 33 L.R.A. 99, 55 Am. St. Rep. 333, 34 Atl. 823.

Messrs. Alonzo L. Miles, John T. Morris, and German H. H. Emory, for appellee:

The alleged contract is illegal and void:

1. Because malum in se.

retain part of it upon his surrendering the remainder was without consideration, and did not defeat the owner's right to recover the other part.

It will be observed that the decisions in these two cases rest upon the ground that there was no consideration to sustain the owner's agreement, and not that the contracts were illegal. It is obvious, therefore, that they furnish no authority against the position taken in SCHIRM v. WIEMAN, that a contract or negotiation for the return of stolen property by the thief is not, if unconnected with any attempt to shield the thief, illegal in such a sense that one ad-

Koch v. Branch, 44 Mo. 543, 100 Am. Dec. 324.

This suit was instituted to recover upon a check given to the appellant by the appellee, under the circumstances which will afterwards be stated. The case was tried without the intervention of a jury, and but one exception was taken, and that was to the action of the court upon the prayers asked for by the respective parties. The court, by its granted instructions, decided there was no sufficient evidence to entitle the appellant to recover. The judgment being against him, the appellant has appealed.

The following facts appear from the record: In July, 1904, the appellant and the appellee, together with two other persons, all members of the Order of Elks, occupied the same room in a hotel in the city of Cincinnati, on the occasion of a convention of the members of that order. During the night, the watch of the appellee was lost under circumstances which led to the belief that it had been stolen. Notice was given by the appellee of his loss, and extensive searches therefor were instituted by officers and detectives throughout the hotel, and elsewhere, vancing or securing money to enable the owner to carry out such contract or arrangement will be denied a recovery. Assuming the legality of the main contract or transaction, there is, of course, a valid consideration for the owner's promise to repay or reimburse the person advancing the money. Such a person is under no antecedent duty to advance the money, whereas, of course, the thief, or even one innocently in possession of the stolen property, is under an antecedent duty to return the property, and therefore his return of it constitutes no consideration for an agreement by the owner.

without, however, obtaining any clue as to the manner of its mysterious disappearance. The appellee obtained no information about his watch until the 7th of December, 1904. About that time the appellant had an interview with a Mr. Lyons, since deceased, a detective in the city of Baltimore. After pledging him not to reveal what he was about to tell him, Lyons told the appellant that the appellee could recover his watch, but would have to pay for it; that parties outside the state had communicated with him, and told him they would accept $350 for it. Neither at that time, nor subsequently, was the appellant informed who these persons were, and he never knew more of the matter than was communicated to him by the detective Lyons. It was shown that on that occasion Lyons employed the appellant "to communicate this information to Mr. Wieman, and, if Mr. Wieman was satisfied to accept the proposition, to turn over the money to Lyons and get the watch, and return it to Wieman." The appellant also stated in evidence, and there is nothing to contradict, or in any respect impeach it, that he knew of the loss of the watch, and believed it had been stolen; but he had no knowledge as to that fact or the manner of its loss, other than that which Wieman himself communicated to him. The appellant communicated this conversation to the appellee. At first, the latter refused to pay anything; but after several weeks he agreed to give $300 if the watch could be returned to him in good condition. The appellant so informed Lyons, and the sum was then agreed to. The appellant testifies without being contradicted that the state of his knowledge at that time was that "Mr. Wieman agreed to pay the money; that the watch was at the time outside the state, and that it was sent for at his [Wieman's] request, through him," and "that Lyons would not have sent to New York for the watch, except Mr. Wieman had authorized me to tell him to have it sent for and that he (Wieman) would pay the $300 for it."

It was under these circumstances that the appellee and appellant met on the 4th of April to carry out the understanding between them as to the return of the watch. Wieman's account of the conversation is substantially as follows: Schirm asked Wieman, Have you got the money? "Wieman replied he had a check," that he paid everything by check; and besides, he said, "suppose he gave a check and that fellow should pocket the money and keeps the watch too, he would have no redress;" and "how do I know the watch is not all battered up." He, Wieman, then suggested to call in Hennegen & Bates and let them examine the watch. Schirm objected to this. Wieman then proceeds, "There is no shenanigan about this." I was to say this, and when I did make that remark I felt a little guilty because there was some scheme arranged beforehand to have a deputy sheriff there, and to seize it, "but I told there was no shenanigan about it." "I wanted the watch at any price." He (Schirm) said: "Well, I will tell you what I will do; I will go to your bank and cash that check. I will first go to the other party and show them that I have got the check." In reference to the last statement, the testimony of the appellant is that he (Schirm) said: "I will go to the Fidelity & Deposit Company and get it cashed, because I will have to deliver the cash for it." Upon this conversation the appellee delivered the check on the Drovers' & Mechanics' National Bank to the appellant, who indorsed it, and had it cashed at the Fidelity & Deposit Company after it was indorsed by Schirm. With the proceeds Schirm obtained the watch and delivered it to the appellee. The payment of it was, the same day, stopped by Wieman, and the appellant afterwards was compelled to make it good, and has not since been reimbursed. It is contended that, under these circumstances there can be no recovery because the consideration of the check was the advancement of money to be used for an illegal purpose; that is, for securing the return by a thief of property alleged to have been stolen. It undoubtedly is a correct principle that one who furnishes funds to another who he knows or has every reason to believe intends to devote them to the perpetration of crime, and that they were procured for that purpose, will not be allowed to maintain an action on his contract. He cannot do so for the reason that, as was said by [Hanauer v. Doane, 12 Wall. 347, 20 L. ed. 441] Judge Story in his Conflict of Laws, § 253: "No one can hesitate to say that such a man voluntarily aids in the perpetration of the fraud, and, morally speaking, is almost, if not quite, as guilty as the principal offender." But is that the case with which we are now dealing? Was it intended by any of the parties to perpetrate a crime with the proceeds of the check? The purpose, as shown, was to employ it in an arrangement having for its object the return of the watch by the supposed thief to its real owner. Unless this object was, for some sufficient reason, fraudulent, or legally wrong, or contrary to public policy, the act of the appellant in advancing or otherwise procuring the money on the appellee's check cannot be so obtained as to preclude the recovery by the appellant of the amount paid him on that account. And this legal conclusion would be equally sound, even though in the transaction in which he advanced his own money or credit for the use of the appellee, the appellant was acting as the agent of the detective, or even of the thief, inasmuch as it was on the credit of the appellee that he acted, unless by so doing he participated in some wrong act. It seems to be clear that, unless it can be maintained that it was illegal, or morally wrong, or contrary to public policy, for the appellee to pay money to the detective or to anyone else for the purpose of recovering his own property, the legal right of the appellant to recover from Wieman in this case cannot be questioned. Now, was it illegal or morally wrong, or contrary to public policy, for Wieman to pay money to secure the recovery of his own property which presumably had been stolen? The solution of this question depends upon the nature of the act and its effect upon the public interest.

Every case of larceny may be considered from two points of view: First, with respect to the interest of the general public in the matter; and then as to the interests of the real owner of the lost property. As to the first, it seems to be clear that the public has no property interest, and, indeed, no other interest, except such as grows out of its duty to protect property and enforce its laws in the interest of the public. For these reasons it is of public interest and in accordance with public policy that the laws for the protection of property shall be effective, in order that the offenders may be promptly apprehended and convicted. Therefore, all proposed agreements made with the thief, or with anyone, by which the apprehension of the criminal, his trial or conviction, may be prevented or obstructed, are contrary to public policy, and absolutely void. With respect to the personal property interests of the real owner, the public has no particular concern. There can be no reason assigned why the owner of stolen property cannot pursue his own interest as he deems proper, so long as there is no interference with the proper enforcement of the laws in the pursuit, apprehension, and conviction of the criminal. The owner may properly take no step, nor make contracts or arrangements, that in any respect will interfere with the performance of these things. He may sue the thief or others in the possession of the stolen property in replevin or by any other appropriate proceeding, and it seems to be without reason to deny him the right to negotiate for the return of any of the property he could sue for, provided he agrees to nothing that has the object or effect of obstructing, impeding, or preventing the apprehension or conviction of the criminal. Upon a contract containing such features having such a purpose or effect there can be no recovery; it is contrary to public policy, and void; and it may be added that anyone who advances money for such a purpose participates in the illegal purpose, and his contract for that purpose is tainted contrary to the public interest, and is void.

There seems to be a wide concurrence in the general principle that contracts for the return of stolen property to the true owner are not void, as being contrary to public policy, so long as they do not interfere, or tend to interfere, with the public interest and duty respecting the apprehension or conviction of the criminal. It was stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Pope Mfg. Co. v. Gormully, 144 U. S. 224, 36 L. ed. 414, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 632, that "ordinarily the law leaves to parties the right to make such contracts as they please, demanding, however, that they shall not require either party to do an illegal thing, and that they shall not be against public policy or in restraint of trade." In Barrett v. Weber, 125 N. Y. 22, 25 N. E. 1068, a suit to foreclose a mortgage, given to secure to the plaintiff payment for goods stolen, the defense set up was that it was given to compound a felony; the court held that it was necessary "to show that there was some agreement or promise on the part of the mortgagee to forbear prosecution for the crime, or to suppress evidence that would tend to prove it." So, in Ford v. Cratty, 52 Ill. 313, an attorney who retained and refused to pay over money of his client was shown a warrant for embezzlement, and told that, unless he paid or secured the claim, the prosecution would be pushed to a conclusion. It was held not to be regarded as having been given to compound a felony. The same view is maintained in Brittin v. Chegary, 20 N. J. L. 630; Deere v. Wolff, 65 Iowa, 37, 21 N. W. 168. In Ward v. Lloyd, 6 Mann. & G. 785, it was moved to set aside a warrant on the ground that it was founded upon an illegal consideration, namely, an agreement to abstain from prosecuting the defendant for embezzlement. The court held, per Tindal, Ch. J., that "this is not the case of a security given to induce an uninterested party to withhold a charge of a criminal nature; there is a just debt due from the defendant to the plaintiff." And Maule, J., said: "The plaintiff demanded what he had a perfect right to demand, viz., money due to him; and the defendant did what he was bound to do, namely, give a security for money which he was bound to pay." Portner v. Kirchner, 169 Pa. 472, 47 Am. St. Rep. 925, 32 Atl. 442; Cass County Bank v. Bricker, 34 Neb. 516, 33 Am. St. Rep. 649, 52 N. W. 575. Many other cases of similar import could be cited. A large number of these will be found referred to in 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 410, note 6, to the effect that it is perfectly lawful for the parties to compromise the civil liability arising from the commission of an offense, and, if this be the sole purpose it is valid. In this case there is no evidence that the appellee agreed to compound the felony, or intended to do so. In fact the proof is not clear that it was the thief who had the possession of the watch. Many circumstances might have then existed which would show that the person for whom the detective was acting came into its possession without having been guilty of a crime. But, without laying much stress upon this, the evidence makes it clear that the purpose of the appellee was solely to regain his property, and, in his efforts to do so, carefully refrained from making any terms, other than upon the payment of the money he was to receive his property. In Brittin v. Chegary, supra, the court said of a transaction similar in some respects to this, that it was "merely getting his own money." We hold that Wieman, in paying the money and receiving the property, did not violate any rule of law, and therefore the act of Schirm in having the check cashed upon his indorsement does not now preclude him from recovering from Wieman the amount which, in consequence thereof, he has had to pay.

It follows that the plaintiff's first prayer should have been granted, and the first of the defendant rejected; the other prayers were properly refused.

Judgment reversed, with costs to the appellant, and new trial awarded.

FRANCES L. FOURNIER et al., Appts.,
v.

JONATHAN L. CLUTTON et al.

(— Mich. —, 109 N. W. 425.)

Decree for alimony—assignability.

1. A decree for permanent alimony is not assignable.

Case Note.—Assignability of decree for alimony: —The case reported, together with Re Robinson, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 160, and Kempster v. Evans, 81 Wis. 247, 15 L.R.A. 391, 51 N. W. 327, the holdings in which with the reasons assigned therefor are sufficiently stated in the opinion in FOURNIER v. CLUTTON, appear to be the only decisions which discuss the assignability of a decree for alimony.

As bearing upon the question, however, reference may be made to Lynde v. Lynde, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Assignment—rescission—tender.

2. A formal tender of consideration received for an assignment of a judgment is not necessary before instituting an action for its rescission, where defendant expressly refuses to accept a tender.

Wetherbee v. Kusterer, 41 Mich. 359, 2 N. W. 45.

Messrs. Jeffries & Williams for appellees.

Carpenter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Complainant Frances L. Fournier is the divorced wife of Charles A. Fitzsimmons. The other complainants are the children of Frances L. Fournier and Charles A. Fitzsimmons. Charles and Frances were divorced May 10, 1895. By this decree it was "ordered and decreed that the defendant (Charles A. Fitzsimmons) pay to the complainant (Frances L. Fournier) the sum of $1,000 together with the costs to be taxed in said cause, the same being in full of all rights, claims, and demands of the said complainant upon the said defendant for permanent alimony. . . . It is further ordered that the complainant have the care, custody, and education of the children, the issue of said marriage, until the further order of this court." On the 27th day of May, 1897, complainant sold, assigned, and transferred said decree to the first-named defendant for the sum of $200. The object of this suit is to set aside said assignment on the ground that a decree for alimony is not assignable. The trial court dismissed said bill. Complainants appeal.

64 N. J. Eq. 736, 58 L.R.A. 471, 97 Am. St. Rep. 692, 52 Atl. 604, which holds that a contract between a wife and her solicitor, providing that, for his services in procuring an allowance of alimony and enforcing its payment, he shall receive a share of the alimony recovered, is void, not only because the claim for alimony is incapable of assignment, but also because the contract is in contravention of public policy. The court says: "An examination into the history of the allowance of alimony, and the

The briefs of counsel and my own research have enabled me to find but two cases touching the question of the assignability of decrees for alimony, viz., Re Robinson, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 160, and Kempster v. Evans, 81 Wis. 247, 15 L. R. A. 391, 51 N. W. 327. Each of these cases holds that such a decree money assigned was an annuity not yet due. While the circumstances distinguish these decisions from the case at bar, it cannot be said that the reasoning upon which they rest is altogether inapplicable to this case. The ground of the decision in Re Robinson is found in these words quoted from the opinion: "The very nature of alimony is inconsistent with its being capable of assignment. We are familiar with instances of allowances which are not alienable in the case of men, such as the half pay of the officers in the Army and Navy, which are given them in order that they may maintain themselves in a sufficient position in life to enable them to be called out for future service if required. Although alimony is not the same thing, it is governed by the same principle. Alimony is an allowance which, having regard to the means of the husband and wife, the court thinks right to be paid for her maintenance from time to time; and the court may alter it or take it away whenever it pleases." In Kempster v. Evans it is decided that a decree for alimony is not assignable because it may be modified or annulled by the court which gave it. I think our own decisions (see Brownson v. Roy, 133 Mich. 617, 95 N. W. 710, and cases there cited) will prevent our holding, as did the court in Kempster v. Evans, that a decree for alimony is not assignable, merely because it may be modified by the court which pronounced it. Can we follow the reasoning of the court in Re Robinson? The ground upon which the court in that case held that an award of alimony was not assignable is, as I understand it, this; viz., that the purpose for which the law gives alimony is to secure the maintenance of the wife. I think this ground is sound, and that it is applicable to the case at bar. The reason why a wife is denied the right to assign an award of alimony intended by the law for her maintenance is not stated, but it is obvious. It is that she may not, by the exercise of that right, frustrate the purpose of the law. That the principal object for which the law awards alimony is the maintenance of the wife, or of the wife and children, is clear. That the recognition of the wife's right to assign that alimony would tend to defeat this object may be easily shown. If the wife has the right to assign her alimony, she may assign it on such terms and conditions as she may make. She may, as in this case, assign a decree for $1,000 upon the receipt of $200, and thus use it as a means of dissipating her husband's estate without any corresponding benefit to herself or to her children. It is not difficult to imagine instances in which the bulk of the husband's estate might thus be transferred to third persons—possibly to unworthy speculators—and the burden of maintaining his wife and children imposed upon the public. It is ap-proposals nature and uses of alimony, will demonstrate that a claim for such an allowance is far different from a right of property. It is not a right to recover damages or compensation for injury to property or person, or for deprivation of property; nor is it a claim for a property interest in a share of the husband's estate. Alimony, in its origin, was the method by which the spiritual courts of England enforced the duty of support, owed by the husband to the wife, during such time as they were legally separated pending the marriage relation." And, after reviewing the practice of allowing alimony at common law and under the statutes of the state, the court continues: "It follows, as a necessary consequence of what has been said, that a wife's claim for an allowance of alimony is a purely personal right, and not in any sense a property right. It is in its nature not susceptible of assignment by the wife to another, nor capable of enjoyment by her in anticipation."

In Jordan v. Westerman, 62 Mich. 170, 4 Am. St. Rep. 836, 28 N. W. 826, the same conclusion was reached.

The nature of a claim for alimony was also considered in Re Le Claire, 124 Fed. 654, in which it was held that property awarded a wife as alimony in a suit for divorce brought prior to the filing by her of a petition in bankruptcy did not become part of her bankrupt estate.

The rights of an assignee of a claim for alimony have, however, been impliedly recognized in Meissner v. Bergman, 11 Ohio C. C. 539, in which it was held that where alimony in a fixed sum, payable in instalments, was adjudged in lieu of dower rights, the court would not relieve the husband from the obligation to pay instalments falling due after the death of the wife, where the wife had assigned the judgment to her daughter in consideration of care and nursing; and in Cohen v. Cohen (Cal.) 88 Pac. 267, which holds that the rights of a purchaser of alimony which had accrued under a decree are subject to the right of the husband to procure a vacation of the judgment as to alimony.

parent that the wife is not the only person interested in the proper application of money decreed as alimony. Her former husband, her children, and the public are also interested (see Ferguson v. Ferguson [Mich.] 13 Det. L. N. 453, 108 N. W. 682), and their interests would be in constant jeopardy if she could at pleasure assign such decrees. I conclude, therefore, that the law gave complainant Frances L. Fournier no authority to assign her decree for alimony.

I am not sure that act No. 230, p. 360, of the Public Acts of 1899, which makes awards for permanent alimony enforceable by contempt proceedings, has not some bearing upon the question under discussion. I think that act was passed upon the assumption that such awards were not assignable. If it were not passed upon that assumption, we must impute to the legislature the intention of giving to the assignees of such awards the right to enforce them by contempt proceedings. I find it difficult to believe that the legislature had any such intention. I do not doubt that the suggestion will occur to many who read this opinion that its effect will be injurious to the interests of the wife where she has a decree against the husband who has no present means of support, but who has such expectations that some speculator will buy her decree and advance money which will relieve her present necessities. To those who think this a legitimate criticism, we suggest that they compare the injury resulting in such instances with the benefits that will result in other instances, both to the wife and to the public generally, by the denial of her right to assign a decree for alimony. But the proper answer to the suggestion is that it is not a legitimate criticism of the opinion. It assumes that the opinion is based on the ground that it is beneficial to wives generally to be denied the right to assign their alimony. While we believe it is so beneficial, this opinion is not based on that ground. It is based on the ground, as heretofore stated, that the existence of the right to assign frustrates the purpose of the law that alimony shall be used for the maintenance of the wife, or of the wife and children.

It is urged that complainant's bill was properly dismissed on the ground that she was guilty of laches. We think this contention is answered by the case of Ripley v. Seligman, 88 Mich. 196, 50 N. W. 143.

It is also claimed that complainant did not tender defendant the $200 she obtained from him, and that for that reason the decree of the lower court should be affirmed. We are convinced by the testimony that, before this bill was filed, complainant undertook to make a tender, and that she did not do so because defendant said he would not accept it. This, in our judgment, excused a more formal tender. See Lacy v. Wilson, 24 Mich. 479.

The decree of the Circuit Court should be reversed, and a decree entered in this court in accordance with the prayer of complainant's bill. Complainant is entitled to costs of both courts.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF OREGON

v.

JOHN C. BARNES, Appt.

(47 Or. 592, 85 Pac. 998.)

Homicide—corpus delicti—proof.

1. The evidence necessary to establish the corpus delicti in cases of homicide must show that the life of a human being has been taken, which question involves the subordinate inquiry as to the identity of the person charged to have been killed, and that the death was unlawfully caused by the party accused thereof, and by no other person.

Same—circumstantial evidence.

2. The identity of a corpse found partly consumed in a fire may, for the purpose of proving the corpus delicti in a prosecution for murder, be established by circumstantial evidence, such as the size of the remains, and the finding, at and near the spot where the body was found, articles known to have belonged to a person who is alleged to have been killed; the weight and sufficiency of the evidence for that purpose being for the jury to determine.

Same—lapse of time—effect.

3. That several days elapse between the finding of a corpse and, near the spot, an article known to have belonged to a certain person who is charged to have been mur-

Case Note.—Sufficiency of circumstantial evidence to identify remains found as those of person charged to have been killed:—

That the identity of the remains found as those of the person charged to have been murdered may be established by circumstantial evidence is abundantly established by the cases cited in the foregoing opinion and those subsequently cited in this note, in which evidence of this character has been held sufficient for the purpose. In People v. Palmer, 109 N. Y. 110, 4 Am. St. Rep. 423, 16 N. E. 529, it was held that the identity of the victim may be established by indirect or circumstantial evidence, notwithstanding the provision of § 181 of the Penal Code, which prohibits a conviction "of murder or manslaughter unless the death of the person alleged to have been killed, and the fact of the killing as alleged, are each established as independent facts, the former dered, does not render the fact of the finding inadmissible in proof of the corpus delicti, but it weakens its force for that purpose.

Same—evidence of murder.

4. That one whose skeleton was found in a burning pile of logs was wrongfully killed may be found from the facts that he was a healthy man, and that, from conditions in the vicinity of the fire, the body had been dragged to it, leaving bloody stains along the way.

Same—sufficiency of evidence.

5. Possession shortly after his homicidal death of articles known to have belonged to decedent, under circumstances which would justify accused's conviction of larceny, will warrant a conviction of murder,—especially when coupled with contradictory statements by accused as to the whereabouts of the missing person.

Same—evidence—remoteness.

6. Upon a trial for murder, evidence is admissible of the finding of a ring which belonged to deceased, several weeks after by direct proof and the latter beyond a reasonable doubt." The court took the position that this provision does not require direct proof of the identity of the victim, but only of the death.

The doctrine of the last case was, upon the authority of that case, adopted in State v. Pepo, 23 Mont. 473, 59 Pac. 721, construing an identical provision of the Penal Code.

It is, of course, impossible to set out fully all the facts and circumstances relied upon in a particular case to establish the identity of the remains; but the following summary of the cases shows in a general way the nature and character of circumstances that have been held sufficient or insufficient to establish such identity:

In some cases, where the body was badly burned, mutilated, or decomposed, identification has been established by articles of clothing and other personal belongings found on or near the body, with little, if any, aid from the appearance of the body itself. See People v. Palmer, supra (it was so held notwithstanding the testimony of witnesses that they had seen the person alleged to have been murdered after the date of the alleged murder); State v. Pepo, supra.

In State v. Winner, 17 Kan. 298, it was held that the identity of the body found as that of the person charged to have been murdered was sufficiently established notwithstanding that the body was burned past recognition. The evidence and circumstances relied upon to establish the identity do not appear from the report of the case.

In other cases clothing and other personal articles as means of identification have been materially aided by the appearance of the body.

Thus, in People v. Beckwith, 108 N. Y. 67, 15 N. E. 53, fragments of a body found in the cabin of the person alleged to have been the commission of the crime, in a piece of tin foil which was found in a sack of potatoes belonging to accused shortly after the crime was committed, but which was not examined until the time of the finding of the ring.

Criminal law—attempt to break jail—evidence of guilt.

7. The attempt of one awaiting trial to escape from jail is a circumstance which may be considered on the question of his guilt.

(June 26, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Douglas County convicting him of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cardwell & Watson, J. E. Sawyers, and J. A. Buchanan for appellant.

Messrs. A. M. Crawford, Attorney General, George M. Brown, and J. M. Williams for the State.

murdered were identified by evidence that the fragments, when put together, outlined, so far as they went, a man of the size and appearance of the person in question, in connection with the finding of bloody clothing that belonged to him, and of a bloody ax, the hair upon it being the color of his. This decision was rendered before the provision of the Penal Code, already referred to, had been construed not to require direct proof of the identity of the victim; and the circumstances above stated were held to constitute "direct proof" of the death of the person alleged to have been killed, within the meaning of that provision.

For the purpose of identifying a body found as that of the person alleged to have been murdered, evidence of similarity in the color of hair and whiskers, of correspondence in the measure of the body and stature, and the testimony of a dentist who had extracted teeth for him of the absence of the same teeth from the jaw of the body, and of the correspondence of marks on other teeth, were held admissible in Lindsay v. People, 63 N. Y. 143.

In State v. Downing, 24 Wash. 340, 64 Pac. 550, the body, which was so far mutilated that little was left of the physical features, was identified by its correspondence with the body of the person claimed to have been murdered in size and stature, character of teeth, color of hair and clothing, in connection with the fact that the body was found near where the person in question was last seen alive.

In Taylor v. State, 35 Tex. 97, the identity of the body was held to be sufficiently established by the recognition of the witnesses' description of the body by the father of the person alleged to have been killed, and the recognition of articles of clothing and certain papers found on or near the body. In the last case the court said that the law does not require any more direct or positive

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, John C. Barnes, was indicted, tried, and convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, alleged to have been committed in Douglas county, April 28, 1905, by killing one William Graham, in some way and manner, and by some means, instruments, and weapons, to the grand jury unknown. He appeals from the judgment of death which followed, and his counsel contend that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, as requested, to return a verdict of not guilty, on the ground that the evidence, which is wholly circumstantial, is insufficient to warrant a conviction.

The entire testimony given at the trial is sent up with the bill of exceptions, from which it appears that on Monday, May 1, 1905, at about 10 o'clock in the forenoon, a human skeleton was discovered in a burning log heap, a few feet east of the right-of-way fence near the railroad, about a mile and a quarter north of Glendale. Nearly all the flesh had been consumed, and there remained of the framework intact only the skull, the vertebrae, and parts of the shoulder and of the hip bones. The structure of the skeleton indicated the death of a small person, but it was impossible to distinguish the sex. A soft black hat, having two matches stuck in the band, was found at the same time hidden beneath the loose bark of a stump near the fire. There were also discovered in the ashes, about where the hips of the skeleton lay, a three-bladed pocket knife, and near it some nails that had probably been driven in the soles and heels of the shoes worn by the deceased. In the immediate vicinity were seen some dark spots on the grass, earth, and stones, supposed to be blood stains, and the grass appeared to be lodged, as if some object had been dragged over it. After quite a number of persons had visited the place where the skeleton was found, a leather belt and a purse were discovered in the brush proof to identify the body of a murdered man than it does to prove the murder or identify the murderer; but all should be so completely proved as to leave no reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury.

In Johnson v. State, 45 Tex. Crim. Rep. 453, 77 S. W. 15, where the defendant was on trial for the murder of her child, it was held that the identity of the child was sufficiently established to justify a conviction, by testimony of a witness that he found the remains of a child that looked like a negro about a year and one half or two years old, in the creek, that the skin on the body was a yellow color as if bleached by lying in the water, although he could not tell the sex, in connection with other evidence tending to show the defendant's guilty connection with the disappearance of her child.

In Carter v. State, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 225, 47 S. W. 979, 49 S. W. 74, 619, the remains were identified by certain peculiarities of moustache and forehead, and by the clothing and a piece of a broken harp found on the body.

In Keith v. State, 157 Ind. 376, 61 N. E. 716, it was held that it was not error to permit the father of the person alleged to have been killed, and other witnesses, to testify that a body found in a creek was that of his daughter. The court, after alluding to the fact that the hair and nails were gone; the skull fractured in many places; the eyes very deeply sunken; the nose somewhat mutilated; flesh somewhat decomposed; and the skin somewhat discolored,—said: "But there was the whole body,—contour, size, age, shape of head and face; tapering fingers; double ankles; birthmark; a certain front tooth decayed; beyond all, that indefinable impression produced by the ensemble."

In Gray v. Com. 101 Pa. 380, 47 Am. Rep. 733, the identity of a human skull and jaw-bone found near the residence of the person alleged to have been killed was established by a lock of hair attached to the skull and the peculiarities of the jawbone, in connection with circumstances tending to show that she had disappeared about a year before the remains were found, and at a time when the prisoner, who had more than once been heard to threaten her life, was known to have been in the vicinity.

In Wilson v. State, 43 Tex. 472, the identity of a skeleton as that of the defendant's wife, whom he was charged with killing, was established by evidence that the skeleton was found at a time and place consistent with and suggestive of the hypothesis that it was that of the defendant's wife; that it corresponded generally with the appearance to be expected at that time in her remains; that it was the skeleton of a woman about her height; that it was the skeleton of a person who, like her, had a missing front tooth, and, according to expert testimony, of a person who, like her, was of mixed blood.

In State v. Dickson, 78 Mo. 439, the identity of the body, which was considerably burned, was established by the opinions of witnesses based upon resemblances of clothing, color of the hair and beard, and the absence of an upper front tooth; and by means of articles found on the body, aided by the false statement by accused to account for the disappearance of the person in question, and evidence of motive and evil intent on the part of accused. The court said that, on questions of identity, it is not necessary that the witness should swear pointedly; it is only necessary, and is a common occurrence, for witnesses to swear that they believe the person to be the same, and the degree of credit to be attached to their evidence is a question for the jury. Again, the court said it is not necessary that the remains be identified by direct and positive about 40 feet from where the fire had been. It further appeared that Graham, the man charged to have been killed, was about 5 feet 4 inches in height, weighed about 140 pounds, usually had matches in his hat band, and always carried a large Colt's revolver in a holster made from a boot top and suspended by a leather belt. Notwithstanding the fiber part of the handle of the knife had been burned, George Wood, as a witness for the state, claimed to recognize it as Graham's property, saying he had given it to him. The hat was claimed to be identified as Graham's by S. H. Duley, who testified that he had seen him wear it. Jesse Clements testified that the belt found in the brush was the one worn by Graham by which his revolver was carried, and which the witness recognized by the clasp of the girdle being loose.

The testimony tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime shows that he and Graham were gold miners who were acquainted with, and had lived near, each other on Dadd's creek, Douglas county, for several months until Thursday, April 27, 1906, when Graham moved across Cow creek to Tuller's creek, several miles westerly, and was last seen as he crossed the railroad going to his new residence. The defendant on the next day borrowed a Winchester rifle from a neighbor, telling him that he desired to shoot a wounded deer which he had seen. That evening, as he returned with the gun, he found two men at his cabin who had been hunting for stray cattle, to whom he stated that Graham claimed to be a "bad man," and referring to the latter, he remarked: "If he makes a crooked move at me, I will kill him." He further stated to his visitors that they need not arise when he did the next morning for he was obliged to get up early so as to meet a man at a tunnel on the railroad. Barnes left his cabin Saturday morning about 4 o'clock, taking the rifle with him, and five hours thereafter he was in the town of Glendale, 10 miles southerly, where he paid a bill which he owed a merchant and received a sum of money in exchange for a piece of cast gold that had been molded by and belonged to Graham, the identity of which was unquestionably established. The defendant left that town soon thereafter, and was seen at several points as he walked northerly along the railroad to a section house near his home, where he secured his supper. He returned to Glendale that night and became intoxicated, leaving two packages in the saloon where he had been imbibing. The next day, Sunday, April 30th, he was seen on the railroad carrying a Win-proof; it suffices if the circumstantial evidence establishes the identity in a manner so satisfactory as to leave no room for reasonable doubt on that point.

In all of the foregoing cases, doubtless, the means of identification by the appearance of the body, or by clothing or other personal belongings found on or near the remains, were aided by other circumstances tending to create a more or less strong probability that the remains found were those of the person claimed to have been murdered. In some cases identity seems to have been established mainly by such circumstances, even when the body was so mutilated, burned, or decomposed as to furnish but little, if any, aid to identification, and notwithstanding that there were no personal belongings found on or near the body to aid identification.

Thus, in State v. Ah Chuey, 14 Nev. 79, 33 Am. Rep. 530, it was held that the identity of a badly charred body as that of the Chinaman alleged to have been killed was sufficiently established to warrant a conviction by testimony that the house where the body was found was used by him as a Chinese washhouse; that the washhouse was being used as usual on the day of the homicide; that some human being therein was killed, and that the house was consumed by fire after the homicide; it further appearing that there were usually but three persons in the house, and that the person in question had never been seen since the destruction of the house, whereas both of the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) other occupants had been seen and were alive.

In State v. Calder, 23 Mont. 504, 59 Pac. 903, where a few teeth and charred bones were identified as those of an adult human being, the testimony of an accomplice as to the identity of the person killed was held to be sufficiently corroborated by the circumstances tending to show the disappearance of the person charged to have been murdered, and to create a strong probability that he was murdered, although there seems to have been nothing found in connection with the remains which would in any way indicate their identity.

In Texas identification without aid furnished by the appearance of the remains, or some part thereof, seems to be impossible, since it is provided by the Penal Code (art. 549) of that state that "no person shall be convicted of any grade of homicide unless the body of the deceased, or portions of it, are found and sufficiently identified to establish the fact of the death of the person charged to have been killed." It has been held in Puryear v. State, 28 Tex. App. 73, 11 S. W. 929, under this provision, that the identity was not sufficiently established to sustain a conviction of the murder of a newly born infant, by the testimony of the mother of the child that, after she had seen the defendant, as she supposed, place the child on the fire, some bones were found in the fireplace, it not being shown whether or not they were the bones of a human being.

chester rifle, and, meeting a man who appeared as a witness at the trial herein, he told him he had been hunting, describing the route he claimed to have traveled. Barnes returned the rifle that day and paid the man from whom he borrowed it 10 cents for the cartridges he had used. About noon that day the defendant engaged one G. L. Hittsman to help him carry some provisions that had come by rail up a hill towards his cabin, and as they halted for a moment's rest Barnes, unwrapping a package, exhibited a revolver, whereupon his companion, referring to Graham, said, "You have got Bill's gun," and the defendant replied, "Oh! yes; I bought it from Bill." Sunday evening Barnes went south on the train towards Glendale. The next morning, May 1, 1905, which will be remembered as the day when the skeleton was found, he called at a saloon in that town about 5 o'clock and, waking the barkeeper, he secured a drink of whisky. At 1 o'clock that day he was about a mile and a quarter north of Glendale, where he met one W. H. Pruett, to whom he stated that Graham had gone to Mule creek, a tributary of the Umpqua river, prospecting, and that he had purchased from him some sluice boxes and was going to his cabin after them. Pruett told him the boxes referred to never belonged to Graham, but had been owned by another person from whom the narrator purchased them. Barnes, upon receiving this information, remarked: "I am so damned tired and sore that I won't go any further. When you see Bill (meaning Graham), tell him that I got this far with you and turned around and went back." Whereupon he departed. The defendant on Tuesday night told a hotel keeper at Glendale that Graham, possessing a few dollars, had gone to California, and, referring to the nails discovered in the ashes, he further said if Graham was found he would have on old rubber boots. The sheriff of Douglas county, on Friday, May 5, 1905, visited Graham's cabin, which was locked; but, opening it, he found the bed in order, some wearing apparel, provisions, dough mixed for bread, water left in pails, and two pairs of rubber boots. The following Sunday Barnes was apprehended at his cabin, underneath which there was then found wrapped in a gunny sack a pistol that was identified as Graham's and referring thereto the defendant, though claiming to have owned the gun several years, said to the sheriff and to the men accompanying him: "I put the revolver there, and I did not expect you fellows to find it." At the time the arrest was made, the defendant's cabin was searched, and in emptying a sack of potatoes a chunk of tin foil rolled out and

And it was held in Lightfoot v. State, 20 Tex. App. 77, that the circumstances relied upon to identify a body found in the water were insufficient in view of the fact that the person charged to have been killed was a negro, whereas the body when found was perfectly white, there being a diversity of opinion between the medical experts of the prosecution and defense whether the effect of the water for the length of time the body was supposed to have remained therein would be to whiten the skin.

So, in Gay v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 450, 60 S. W. 771, identity was held not to be sufficiently established where about a tin cupful of bones, with buttons, brads, and a tuft of hair, were found, the bones being identified as those belonging to a human being, by experts who, however, were unable to tell whether the bones were those of a white man, Mexican, negro, or Indian, although one of the experts, a dentist, stated that the size of the teeth indicated that they were those of a man; it further appearing that the tuft of hair, which contained from 50 to 70 strands, showed no gray hair, whereas the hair of the person alleged to have been murdered was intermingled with gray.

In Walker v. State, 14 Tex. App. 609, the identity of a skeleton as that of the murdered man was sought to be established by articles of clothing and other articles found upon the same; but the evidence to identify such articles as belonging to such person was unsatisfactory, and the proof of the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

identity was therefore held insufficient to meet the requirements of the article of the Penal Code already above referred to.

In Smith v. Com. 21 Gratt. 809, it was held that the identity of the body of an infant as that of the infant charged to have been murdered was not sufficiently established by the circumstances relied on. The court called special attention to the testimony that the infant alleged to have been killed was a bright mulatto, whereas the description of the body found was merely that it was a mulatto, and that the clothing on the body of the dead child was not identified as that which was worn by the child alleged to have been murdered.

In all of the foregoing cases the circumstances of a positive nature relied upon to establish identification were aided to a greater or less degree, depending upon the time elapsed, by the negative circumstance of the disappearance of the person charged to have been murdered, although, as above shown, in one case in which a conviction was sustained this negative circumstance was not left without contradiction.

The question as to the sufficiency of circumstantial evidence to establish the death of the person charged to have been murdered, when there is no claim that his remains have been found, presents another question, which has not been touched upon in this note.

fell to the floor; but, without any examination, it was picked up and placed with the potatoes in the sack which had contained them. The sheriff, about May 31, 1905, took the defendant's goods and provisions from his cabin to the house of a neighbor, who, taking potatoes from a sack which had been so brought to him, saw a piece of tin foil which he swept with the dust into a fireplace where it remained until the 17th of the next month when, concluding to make solder of the foil, he picked it up and unrolled it, discovering inwrapped therein a diamond ring that had belonged to, and been worn by, Graham. The defendant gave no testimony at his trial and called only two hardware dealers, who as witnesses severally testified that the knife, the parts of which were found in the ashes, and the revolver that was discovered beneath Barnes's cabin were generally kept and sold by merchants engaged in their trade. It also appeared that, while the defendant was incarcerated in jail awaiting trial on the charge of which he was convicted, he attempted to escape.

It is argued by defendant's counsel that the evidence hereinbefore detailed, which we deem a fair statement of that given at the trial, is insufficient to establish either the death of William Graham, the person charged to have been killed, or the criminal agency of the defendant. In State v. Williams (Or.) 80 Pac. 655, it was held that circumstantial evidence alone was sufficient to prove the death of the person alleged to have been killed, and also the criminal agency of the party accused of the commission of the offense. In that case the person charged to have been killed was last seen in the presence of the defendant in that action, and there were found in what was supposed to have been a temporary grave gunny sacks that had been saturated with a liquid which, by chemical analysis, was claimed to have been human blood, and also a lock of a woman's hair which was recognized as that of his alleged victim. The evidence necessary to establish the corpus delicti in cases of homicide must show (1) that the life of a human being has been taken, which question involves the subordinate inquiry as to the identity of the person charged to have been killed; and (2) that the death was unlawfully caused by the party accused thereof, and by no other person. In Campbell v. People, 159 Ill. 9, 50 Am. St. Rep. 134, 42 N. E. 123, it was held that the corpus delicti might be proved in a prosecution for murder by circumstantial evidence where that was the best proof obtainable; but that great caution should be observed in acting upon it.

case at bar, to prove the first element stated, Dr. W. H. Dale, a licensed practising physician, and a graduate of a reputable medical college, who was a witness at the coroner's inquest, testified that he was positive the skeleton found in the burning log heap was the remains of a human being. As to the identity of the remains, it is not necessary that the evidence should be direct and positive, where such proof is impracticable. Wills, Circumstantial Ev. 6th Am. ed. 213; Taylor v. State, 35 Tex. 97. Thus, in Rex v. Clewes, 4 Car. & P. 221, a carpenter's rule and the remains of a pair of shoes found near a skeleton were in part the means used to identify the relics of a man who had been buried twenty-three years. In Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711, the metallic teeth of a person found in a furnace were held sufficient to prove the identity of a person charged to have been killed. In State v. Williams, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 446, 78 Am. Dec. 248, the charred remains of a missing woman were identified by the finding of certain hair pins with the bones and proof that the deceased was in the habit of wearing such pins two or three years prior thereto. In Jackson v. State, 29 Tex. App. 458, 16 S. W. 247, the identity of a child was proved by finding a number of small bones, locks of short curly black hair, and a small calico bonnet. So, too, in State v. Martin, 47 S. C. 67, 25 S. E. 113, the identity of the charred remains of a person was established by finding in the ashes with the skeleton a piece of burned cloth like the woven fabric of which his trousers were made, and which he wore at the time of his disappearance, and by discovering in the same place a slate pencil with certain indentations thereon. In the case at bar the witness George Wood, referring to the knife found in the ashes, in answer to the direction: "Tell the jury why you know the knife," said: "I know the knife by the shape, the make, and by the defects in it. The knife was always loose in the springs here, and hard to open. That is the reason that I gave it to Graham."

It is argued by defendant's counsel that, the fire having consumed a part of the handle of the knife, the heat was sufficiently intense to injure the springs, and, this being so, the witness could not recognize the instrument which was commonly sold by hardware dealers, and hence the skeleton was not identified as the remains of Graham. The testimony so given by Woods was competent, and its adequacy was a question which the jury were called upon to determine. Udderzook v. Com. 76 Pa. 340. The hat which was found beneath the loose bark of an old stump near the fire, at the time the skeleton was taken from the ashes, was identified as the head covering worn by Graham, whose habit it was to carry matches stuck in his hat band. The finding of two matches so placed in the hat referred to affords corroborative evidence of the identity of the person who carried them in this peculiar manner. So, too, the finding of the belt in the brush, though not discovered until several days after the fire, was identified as Graham's girdle. The finding, near the remains of a human being of property that is recognized as having belonged to a missing person is a circumstance tending to identify the body of the deceased. It is possible, however, that such property may have been purposely placed by its owner where it was found to induce the belief that a living person is in fact dead, or that such personal chattels were intentionally put in the place indicated to create an inference of the identity of the deceased where doubt on that subject exists. The degree of proof resulting from such discovery necessarily depends upon the opportunity which time and interest afford a designing person to manufacture evidence. The finding of the belt several days after the inquest was held, when there had been time and chance to create an inference of the identity of the deceased, weakens the evidence which the circumstance of the discovery would ordinarily produce, if seasonably made. Such evidence was admissible, and it will be presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that the court correctly instructed the jury as to the degree of proof which the circumstances adverted to furnished. It will be remembered that the parts of the skeleton found in the burning log heap indicated the remains of a small person. This fact, alone, is not controlling on the question of identity, for the human framework discovered might have been that of any person corresponding in stature with Graham (Com. v. Webster, supra); but, when this circumstance is considered in connection with the other attending conditions, we think the jury were authorized in concluding, as the verdict implies, that the remains were those of the person charged to have been killed. The consumption of a human body by fire does not necessarily repel an inference of suicide or of an unintentional death, for the dissolution may have been caused by purposely leaping or accidentally falling into a fire, or by being unable to escape from a burning building. So, too, a human body may be destroyed by that means after death has resulted from natural causes. The finding of the remains of a healthy person, like Graham, in a burning log heap, where escape was possible in case contact with the fire was accidental, and probably where immediate intense pain resulting from the flame would cause an abandonment of an attempt at self-destruction, must necessarily repel every inference of death by means of such a fire. This conclusion is fortified by the testimony of a locomotive fireman who said that on Monday, May 1, 1905, at about 2:20 A. M., he saw, on the east of the railroad, about a mile and a quarter north of Glendale a fire and a man standing by it. From this declaration under oath it would seem to appear that the fire which consumed Graham's body was not ignited by him. The evidence of what was supposed to have been blood stains in the vicinity of the ashes, and the appearance of the grass and weeds indicating that some object had been dragged towards the fire, thereby lodging the vegetation and staining the right-of-way fence with blood, warranted the jury in concluding that Graham's death did not result from natural causes, or from suicide.

This brings us to a consideration of that branch of the question which involves the criminal agency. It will be remembered that on Saturday, April 29, 1905, at about 9 o'clock in the morning the defendant paid a bill which he owed a merchant in Glendale by giving a piece of gold that had belonged to Graham. The next day Barnes exhibited a revolver to the witness Hittsman, saying he had purchased it from Graham, which gun was found when the defendant was arrested hidden beneath his cabin. At the time the revolver was found there was also seen in a sack of potatoes in Barnes's cabin a piece of tin foil. These potatoes were taken to a neighbor's house and emptied, there dropped from the sack a piece of tin foil, which being thereafter unrolled, a diamond ring was discovered that had belonged to Graham. In Williams v. Com. 29 Pa. 102, it was held that an instruction, directing the jury to infer the commission of the crime of murder from the possession of stolen articles, where the evidence was adequate to warrant a conviction of the latter crime, correctly stated the law applicable to the facts involved. In deciding that case, Mr. Justice Porter, comparing the instruction referred to with another that had been given, says: "In that portion of the charge which treats of the possession of the coin, and the right of the jury to infer a higher crime from the possession of stolen articles, sufficient to convict the defendant of larceny, we see as little to condemn. If criminal offenses are to be punished, circumstances like these must be laid hold of to prove them." In Poe v. State, 10 Lea, 873, a similar instruction was given at the trial of the plaintiffs in error, who were charged with the commission of the crime of murder in the first degree, and it was held that no error was committed, the court saying: "In fact, the recent possession of stolen articles under these circumstances would not merely be a strong circumstance, but raise a presumption of guilt, upon which the jury should convict." So, too, in State v. Anderson, 10 Or. 448, a pocketbook containing money that had belonged to a person alleged to have been killed having been found in the possession of the defendant was considered as tending to establish his criminal agency.

An exception was taken by defendant's counsel to the admission of testimony as to the finding of Graham's diamond ring, on the ground that the circumstance was too remote, indefinite, and uncertain. In Morris v. State, 30 Tex. App. 95, 16 S. W. 757, testimony of the finding in a well, of a watch, the property of a person charged to have been killed, several months after the alleged murder, was held admissible in connection with other evidence proving that on the day the defendant was arrested he had access to the well and could have thrown the watch into it. It will be remembered that on the day Barnes was arrested there was found in his sack of potatoes a small roll of tin foil, the identity of which was reasonably accounted for, which, being unwrapped, revealed Graham's diamond ring. Evidence of this circumstance in connection with the others was, in our opinion, admissible. In the case of State v. Anderson, supra, the defendant's contradictory statements as to the whereabouts of the missing person were also regarded as tending to create an inference of his guilt. In the case at bar Barnes stated that Graham had gone to Mule creek prospecting, and afterward that he had gone to California, saying that Graham had a few dollars, thereby implying that he was able to travel by rail. As Mule creek is situated west of Glendale and California south of that town, it was possible for a person going to the former place to continue his journey to the sister state; but, as the travel by rail is so much easier and speedier than journeying over the mountains, the defendant's declarations should be considered as tending to incriminate him. State v. Reed, 60 Me. 550. The defendant having attempted to escape from the jail in which he was confined, awaiting trial on the charge of which he was convicted, is also a circumstance slightly tending to prove his guilt. Circumstantial evidence is legal and competent in the gravest kind of criminal cases; and, if it is of such a character as to exclude every reasonable hypothesis, other than that the party accused of the commission of the offense is guilty thereof, it is sufficient to authorize a conviction.

Believing that the attending circumstances adverted to are of the character indicated, and that other alleged errors that have been assigned are unimportant, the judgment is affirmed.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

MRS. R. M. TURNER, Resp't.,
v.
SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

Damages—loss of baggage—trouble and expense.

Damages for loss of baggage by a carrier cannot include the trouble and expense of trying to locate it, or in purchasing other wearing apparel to replace that lost, in the absence of notice to the carrier at the time of delivering the baggage to him of facts which would render special damages probable.

(August 10, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Cherokee County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the loss of baggage delivered to defendant for transportation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sanders & DePass, for appellant:

The amount expended by plaintiff in the purchase of other clothing, because of the loss of her trunk, is not an element of damage. So, expenses incurred by the plaintiff

Case Note.—Right to recover expenses or damages incidental to loss of, or delay in delivering, baggage:—The generally accepted rule is that the measure of damages for loss of baggage by a carrier is the value of the articles lost. Mote v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 27 Iowa, 22, 1 Am. Rep. 212; New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Moore, 40 Miss. 30; Spooner v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 23 Mo. App. 403; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Taylor, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 192; Mauritz v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 23 Fed. 765; Provencher v. Canadian P. R. Co. Montreal L. Rep. 5 S. C. 9.

Hotel expenses incurred while waiting for the baggage to arrive are not recoverable. Provencher v. Canadian P. R. Co. supra.

Nor expenses incurred in searching for the lost baggage. Mississippi C. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 41 Miss. 671; Spooner v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. supra.

But in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) § 1254, a request to charge that plaintiff was not entitled to recover damages for expenses incurred in searching for his baggage, further than such expenses necessarily incurred in ascertaining whether said baggage had in endeavoring to rescue or find the property are too remote.

App. 403; 3 Sutherland, Damages, 2d ed. § 955.

Messrs. Butler & Osborne, for respondent:

This is an action for tort, and not one on contract. The rule as to proper elements of damages is different from that for mere breach of contract.

Pickens v. South Carolina & G. R. Co. 54 S. C. 498, 32 S. E. 567; Devereux v. Champion Cotton Compress Co. 17 S. C. 73.

Even remote damages are allowed where they are the direct and proximate result of the tort complained of.

reached its destination, was held to be erroneously refused. And compare Morrison v. European & N. A. R. Co. infra.

In an action for damages for loss of baggage, evidence of the expenditure by the plaintiff for wearing apparel to take the place of that lost is improper. Merrill v. Pacific Transfer Co. 131 Cal. 582, 63 Pac. 915; New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Moore, supra.

In the absence of special circumstances, consequential damages are not recoverable. Thus, where the plaintiff did not inform the carrier that he was a dentist, and that his baggage contained the implements of his profession, and that, in case they should be lost, he would be unable to pursue his vocation, he cannot recover profits which he might have made in the practice of his profession if his baggage had not been lost. Brock v. Gale, 14 Fla. 523, 14 Am. Rep. 356.

And, where it is not alleged that the carrier was informed of the facts which would render such damages probable in event of the loss of the baggage, no recovery can be had for the loss of an engagement as teacher of a school, and for loss of pay as a preacher. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Taylor, supra.

The measure of damages recoverable for delay in the transportation of baggage is the value of its use during such delay. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hindsman, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) § 204; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Taylor, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 192; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In actions for negligence for loss of baggage the defendant is liable for all damages that naturally and proximately follow as a result of the tort and for any expenses or other damage the owner may suffer by reason of the tort.

Mere inconvenience, where it is alleged and shown to be a result of negligence, may be considered as an element of damage by the jury.

Vancil, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 427, 21 S. W. 303; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Douglas (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 487.

Hotel expenses incurred while waiting for the baggage to arrive, and the expense of a journey which was rendered abortive by the want of business papers which were among the baggage, are not recoverable. Morrison v. European & N. A. R. Co. 15 N. B. 295.

Nor are expenses incurred by the plaintiff in searching for the baggage. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hindsman, supra. Contra, Morrison v. European & N. A. R. Co. supra, in which it was held that a reasonable expense of searching, telegraphing, and cab hire in going to the carrier's office is recoverable.

Expenses incurred by the plaintiff in the purchase of clothing and for laundry while waiting for the delivery of baggage are too remote to enter into the measure of damages. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Douglas, supra.

In the absence of special circumstances, consequential damages arising from delay in delivering baggage are not recoverable. Thus, it was held in Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Willis, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 71, and Katz v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 46 Misc. 259, 91 N. Y. Supp. 720, that, where it does not appear that the particular loss was within the contemplation of the parties as a contingency which might follow delay in delivering baggage, no recovery can be had for loss of time and profits by a salesman whose trunk containing samples is delayed in transportation.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff alleged in her complaint the loss by the defendant of her trunk and its contents, which the defendant had undertaken to carry for her as a passenger on its road from Salisbury, North Carolina, to Memphis, Tennessee. In addition to the value of the trunk and the wearing apparel which constituted its contents, the plaintiff sought to recover for "the trouble, annoyance, worry, and expense" in trying to locate the trunk and in communicating with defendant about it, in being deprived of the use of the trunk and its contents, and in having to purchase other wearing apparel. The motion made to strike out all allegations of the complaint referring to the claim for trouble, annoyance, worry, and expense, was granted by consent as to annoyance and worry, but refused as to trouble and expense incurred as above set forth. The charge to the jury as to defendant's liability for such trouble and expense was in accordance with this ruling. The jury found a verdict for $360, the entire amount claimed, which necessarily included $150 claimed on account of trouble and expense, in addition to the value of the baggage. The question made by appeal is whether, in case of complete loss of baggage, no previous notice being given to the carrier of special circumstances, the recovery would be limited to the actual value, without taking into the account any expense or trouble incurred in the effort to recover it, or in being deprived of its use, or in purchasing other apparel. The general rule is that the carrier is liable for the value only, not necessarily, however, the market value, but the value of such property for the use of the owner. Wood v. Maine C. R. Co. 99 Am. St. Rep. 385, note (98 Me. 98, 56 Atl. 457); Fairfax v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 167, 29 Am. Rep. 119; Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Seale, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 364, 67 S. W. 437; Cooney v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 121 Ala. 368, 53 L.R.A. 690, 25 So. 712; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 584; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 676.

This is the application to loss of baggage of the general rule recognized in this state, that the measure of damages for loss of goods by a carrier is their value at the place of destination. Wallingford v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 26 S. C. 268, 2 S. E. 19. The case of Nettles v. South Carolina R. Co. 7 Rich. L. 190, 62 Am. Dec. 409, has been referred to as controlling authority for the proposition that in case of loss of goods the owner may recover, not only the value of goods, but any other loss or expense occasioned by the failure to deliver. The court does say in that case: "The defendants were, by the contract, which, as common carriers, they made with the plaintiff, bound to deliver the goods in Camden within a reasonable time. Raphael v. Pickford, 5 Mann. & G. 551. After the expiration of the reasonable time, without disproof of negligence on their part, they became answerable for the wrong of nondelivery; and, if nothing more had appeared, the measure of damages would have been the value of the goods at the place where they should have been delivered, together with any reasonable loss and expenses which had been directly occasioned by the wrong." That case, however, did not involve the measure of damages for loss of goods, but for delay in transportation, the instruction to the jury being approved, the plaintiff ought to have received the goods when tendered and claimed the damages which he had sustained from nondelivery in time, and that the verdict must be less than the value of the goods, as it could only cover damages for delay in delivery. The verdict of $100 was sustained as a measure of the loss and expense due to delay in transportation, not embracing nor reaching the value of the goods, but, on the contrary, as being less than the value. The case of Wall v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 71 S. C. 337, 51 S. E. 95, the decision of which was rested on Nettles v. South Carolina R. Co. was very peculiar. The verdict in the magistrate's court was for $75. The circuit judge reduced the judgment to $55, which was near the value of the baggage, but he also ordered a valise produced by the defendant at the trial as the lost baggage to be delivered to the plaintiff. There was evidence that the valise which was checked in June contained wearing apparel for summer, which was out of season and of little value when it was tendered in October, and, while both sides appealed, there was no exception to the order requiring the delivery of the valise to the plaintiff. The judgment of the circuit court was regarded as a judgment for the return of baggage delayed in transportation and damages fixed as a finding of fact by the circuit court for the failure to deliver from June to October; the evidence being that there had been great deterioration, in addition to the deprivation of the use. The case was one of great doubt, even under these peculiar facts, and is not to be regarded as authority for holding that anything more than the value of lost baggage may be recovered of a carrier in the absence of information to the carrier of facts which would render probable special damages.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed unless the plaintiff shall, within thirty days, remit from the verdict $150, the amount embraced therein over and above the value of the baggage.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY et al., Plffs. in Err.,

v.
C. B. THOMPSON.

(— Tex. —, 97 S. W. 459.)

Conflict of laws—contract governing master's liability.

The statute of a state where the action is brought to recover damages for injuries to an employee, making void unreasonable contracts for notice of the injury to the employer as a condition to maintaining an action in such cases, is not applicable to affect a contract valid in the sister state where made, and in that where the injury occurred, in the absence of anything to disclose a legislative intent to make it applicable to such contracts.

(November 14, 1906.)

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Tarrant County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. N. H. Lassiter, Robert Harrison, and J. H. Barwise, Jr., for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Stewart & Templeton for defendant in error.

Case Note.—Law governing stipulation in contract making notice of damages a condition of right of action:—As intimated in the foregoing opinion, there are two possible theories upon which the court might have refused to enforce the stipulation in question notwithstanding that it was valid by the proper law of the contract: (1) That the stipulation pertained to the remedy, and was therefore governed by the law of the forum; (2) that the law of Texas on the subject embodied such a distinctive public policy as to forbid the courts of that state to enforce a stipulation not in conformity therewith, although valid by its proper law.

In Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Tabor, 98 Ky. 503, 34 L.R.A. 685, 32 S. W. 168, 36 S. W. 18, a stipulation, in a contract made in Kentucky for the transportation of a car load of cattle from a point in that state to a point in Ohio, providing that written notice of an injury to the cattle or claim for damages must be given before the cattle were unloaded or mixed with other cattle, was held void because in violation of a provision of the Kentucky Constitution; the court stating that the stipulation, being void where it was made, was void everywhere. This case, by reason of the language just referred to, affords some support for the position taken in the above case, that such a stipulation relates to the substance of the contract, and not to the remedy merely. The case, however, is not authoritative on that point, for the reason that Kentucky was both the forum and the place where the contract was made.

The Kentucky case is obviously no authority upon the question whether a provision in a local statute or Constitution, invalidating stipulations of this kind, is such a part of the distinctive policy of the forum as to prevent its court from enforcing such a stipulation in a contract valid by its proper law.

It is true that if, as appears to have been the case, the action in CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. THOMPSON was ex delicto, the rights of the parties would in general be determined by the law of Oklahoma, where the tort occurred. The court, however, was right in assuming that any defense depending upon the contract would be determined by the proper law of the contract. See 2 Parmeles Wharton, Confl. L. § 478b. The contention that the law of Kansas governed would have had a better foundation if the contract had required that, under all circumstances, the notice should be given in that state. As shown in §§ 4271 and 471c of the work already referred to, the courts generally make the intention of the parties, expressed or presumed, the ultimate criterion of the governing law with respect to the validity or invalidity of a particular provision or stipulation measuring the rights and duties of the parties; and, as shown in § 427p, the presumption, in the absence of anything to the contrary, is that the parties contract with reference to the law of the place of performance with respect to matters connected with the performance of the contract.

And it is to be observed, in this connection, that different parts of a contract may have different places of performance. In the case of Vanco De Sonora v. Bankers' Mut. Casualty Co. 124 Iowa, 576, 104 Am. St. Rep. 367, 100 N. W. 532, for example, the court, without undertaking to determine the place of performance for other purposes, or the governing law in general, of a contract insuring a Mexican bank against loss in shipments of money between points in the United States, or between the United States and Canada, held that the law of Mexico determined whether one was an adult for the purposes of a provision in the contract requiring that the packing and sealing of the packages containing the money be witnessed by two adults, upon the ground that the particular part of the contract re-

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error applied for and received from plaintiffs in error at Chickasha, Indian territory, employment in the capacity of brakeman. His application, which constitutes part of the contract of employment, contained this stipulation: "In further consideration of my employment, I agree that if, while in the service of the said company, I sustain any personal injury, for which I shall or may make claim against said company for damages, I will, within thirty days after receiving such injury, give notice in writing of such claim to the general claim agent of said company, at Chicago, for injuries occurring in Illinois or Iowa, and to the general attorney of said company, at Topeka, for injuries occurring elsewhere on the system, which notice shall state the time, place, manner, and cause of my being injured, and the nature and extent of my injuries, and the claim made therefor, to the end that such claim may be fully, fairly, and promptly investigated; and my failure to give notice of such claim in the manner and within the time aforesaid shall be a bar to the institution of any suit on account of such injuries." He was afterwards, in Oklahoma territory, hurt while performing his duties to plaintiffs in error under the contract, and brought this action and recovered the judgment before us for damages upon the ground that his injury resulted from the negligence of defendant in failing to exercise proper care in keeping its track in safe condition. At the trial the defendant offered in evidence the contract above stated, together with evidence to show that it was valid under the laws of the Indian territory and of Oklahoma, and that the notice had not been given as agreed upon; all of which facts had been pleaded in the answer. This evidence was excluded upon the objections urged by the plaintiff. The court of civil appeals held that this ruling was justified by article 337 of the Revised Statutes of 1895 of this state, which provides: "No stipulation in any contract requiring notice to be given of any claim for damages as a condition precedent to the right to sue thereon shall ever be valid, unless such stipulation is reasonable, and any such stipulation fixing the time within which such notice shall be given at a less period than ninety days shall be void; and, when any such notice is required, the same may be given to the nearest or any other convenient local agent of the company requiring the same. In any suit brought under this and the preceding article it shall be presumed that notice has been given, unless the want of notice is specially pleaded under oath."

The stipulation was regarded by the court

lating to packing and sealing was to be performed in Mexico. The fact, however, that for injuries occurring in Illinois or Iowa the notice was to be given to the agent at Chicago, militates against the contention that the law of Kansas should govern, since it would be unreasonable to impute to the parties an intention that the governing law in respect of this provision of the contract should depend upon the law of Illinois or of Kansas, depending on the place where the injury was sustained. A somewhat analogous question has arisen with respect to carriers' contracts for the transportation of goods from a point in one state to a point in another state. In a few cases of this kind the courts have conceived of the contract as divisible into parts corresponding to the various places of performance, and as thus (upon the principle that the law of the place of performance governs) subjected successively to the law of the place where the transportation commences, to that of each place through which it extends, and to the place of destination. See Carpenter v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 72 Me. 388, 39 Am. Rep. 340; Barter v. Wheeler, 49 N. H. 9, 6 Am. Rep. 434; Gray v. Jackson, 51 N. H. 9, 12 Am. Rep. 1; Rixford v. Smith, 52 N. H. 355, 13 Am. Rep. 42, and note in 63 L.R.A. 516. The vast majority of the cases, however, take the view that a carrier's contract of this kind is entire and indivisible, and that any provision therein of a general nature, e. g., a stipulation limiting the carrier's common-law liability, which may be called into operation by an act or event occurring at the point of departure, at any point along the line of carriage, or at the point of destination, is governed by a uniform law, and that the governing law does not depend on the place of the occurrence, act, or event by which the provision is called into operation. See note to 63 L.R.A. 517. It has been held, however, that this principle does not apply with respect to the provisions of the local law, or stipulations in the contract that have exclusive reference to matters affecting the rights and duties of the parties at destination. e. g., the question as to the continuance of the carrier's liability as such. See Spring v. South Bound R. Co. 46 S. C. 104, 24 S. E. 166, and note in 63 L.R.A. 519. If the provision in the Thompson Case had required the claim under all circumstances to be presented in Kansas, the case would perhaps have been analogous to the carrier cases last referred to. In view, however, of the fact that the claim was to be presented in Illinois or Kansas according to the place of the injury, the analogy is rather with the class of cases that fall within the general principle which refers carriers' contracts to a uniform law.

Assuming, in accordance with the general principle already stated, that the parties are presumed to have intended that this of civil appeals as affecting only the remedy, in analogy to the statute of limitations, and as being controlled by the law of the forum. The evident purpose of the stipulation was to secure notice to the employer of the claim of the servant that it was liable for an injury suffered by him in order that an opportunity might be given for prompt investigation and ascertainment of the facts affecting the claim. Phillips v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 95 Tex. 643, 69 S. W. 63. It fixes no time within which suit must be brought after notice has been given, leaving the plaintiff free to sue within the time allowed by law. But it attaches to the failure to give the notice the effect of "a bar to the institution of any suit on account of such injuries." The bar is not to arise from lapse of time merely, but from the failure to do that which the parties agreed on as essential to the right to have a determination by suit of the question of liability for the injury. Its effect, if enforced according to its terms, was either to prevent the accrual of liability, or to put an end to all further question of liability after the expiration of the prescribed time without notice. Whether it had the effect first mentioned, as contended by plaintiffs in error, or the latter, as contended by defendant in error, is wholly immaterial to the present inquiry. In either view it acts upon the substantive rights of the parties, and not upon the mere mode and time of their enforcement in the courts. Had it been only an agreement, valid both in Oklahoma and in the Indian territory, to fix a period within which suit must be brought, we should have the question, which we need not consider, whether the time so fixed or that prescribed by our statute of limitations would govern. Parmele's Wharton, Confl. L. vol. 2, p. 1434. The cases of Armstrong v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. 92 Tex. 117, 46 S. W. 33, and Burgess v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 92 Tex. 125, 71 Am. St. Rep. 833, 46 S. W. 794, cited by the court of civil appeals, do not decide the question before us. In the Armstrong Case the contract was made in Texas, and was subject to our laws, unless the fact that it was for an interstate shipment put it beyond their operation; and that was the question discussed. The contract in the Burgess Case was made in Louisiana; the law of which, presumed to be the same as that of this state, made it illegal. This is the gist of the decision, the court holding, as in the Armstrong Case, that it was in the power of the state legislatures to make regulations applicable to contracts concerning interstate commerce. Neither case holds that the statute of this state applies to contracts made in other jurisdictions. Indeed, the Burgess Case holds that the contract there in question was governed by the law of Louisiana.

It is too well settled to require citation of stipulation of their contract should be governed by the law of the place of performance, there is an apparent difficulty in determining the governing law, arising from the fact that there are different, or at least alternative, places of performance (Illinois and Kansas). Here, again, an analogy drawn from carriers' contracts for the transportation of property from a point in one state to a point in another may be of service. The majority of the courts that have dealt with that class of contracts, being confronted with conflicting presumptions by reason of the different places of performance, have adopted as a prima facie rule that the contract is governed by the law of the state or country in which the contract is made and the transportation commences. (See note 63 L.R.A. 518 et seq.) It must be conceded, however, that the analogy is not perfect, for the reason that in the carrier cases the very provision in question was performable in part in the state where the contract was made, whereas in the THOMPSON CASE, although some parts of the contract were undoubtedly performable in Indian territory where the contract was made, in no event was the particular provision under discussion to be performed there. In the case of Morgan v. New Orleans, M. & T. R. Co. 2 Woods, 244, Fed. Cas. No. 9,804, however, the court gave as a reason for the rule with respect to carriers' contracts that, in the embarrassment resulting from the equal and opposite presumptions with respect to the laws of the different places of performance, the court could do no better than to fall back on the general rule that a contract is to be governed by the law of the place where it is made. This reasoning is applicable by analogy to the THOMPSON CASE, although it is not in that case, as it is in the carrier cases, aided by the fact that the place where the contract was made was also one of the places of performance of the very provision in question. In the absence of other circumstances, however, it would obviously be impossible to measure the comparative force of the conflicting presumptions in favor of the law of Illinois on one side and the law of Kansas on the other; and, unless the court in such a case is to regard the provision as divisible, it probably can do no better—to use the phraseology employed in the case already cited—than to fall back on the general rule that a contract is to be governed by the law of the place where it is made. This is practically the result reached in the THOMPSON CASE, though it will be observed that the validity of the provision in question is referred to the law of Indian territory, not as the law of the place where the contract was made, but as the law of the place where the contract was in most respects to be performed.

authority that the statutes of a state have no extraterritorial operation, and cannot invalidate contracts made and to be performed in other jurisdictions. The courts of this state might be forbidden by the laws of the state, in the absence of constitutional obstacles, to enforce particular contracts, although made in other jurisdictions, by the laws of which they would be valid. The rule by which courts of one country test the validity of contracts made and to be performed in other countries, in accordance with the laws of such countries, is one of comity only, and cannot be applied in opposition to the positive law of the forum; and, if the statute in question disclosed a purpose to change this rule of comity, and to prevent the courts of this state from applying it to contracts made and to be performed out of the state, questions of a different nature might arise. But we can discover nothing of the sort in it. No reference is made to foreign contracts, nor is any command or inhibition concerning them laid upon the courts. Instead, the statute assumes to act directly upon the contracts and stipulations to which it relates, declaring them to be illegal and invalid. This is a sufficient indication that the provisions relate to things, the legality and validity of which were under the control of the legislature, and not to those which were beyond its power, and which it could not nullify. For, while the legislature might set aside the rule of comity by which contracts elsewhere made are enforced by our courts in conformity with the law governing their making and performance, it could not render those contracts void, and the purpose to do so should not be imputed when it does not appear. Hence we conclude that the transactions to which this statute applies are such as occur in this state, and that the statute has no application to this case. And if we could hold that the statute did apply, we do not see how that would enable the courts of this state to render a judgment for plaintiff, as upon a cause of action which had accrued to him under the laws of Oklahoma, if, according to those laws, he has none which he can assert. It is only by virtue of the principles of comity that the plaintiff, a citizen of the Indian territory, can ask our courts to enforce a transitory cause of action, which he claims accrued to him in Oklahoma; and this does not entitle him to have a portion of the law of that territory affecting his claim disregarded because it differs from ours. His right of recovery must be given by the law of the place where his injury occurred, whether that law be ascertained by proof, or by presumption in the absence of proof. 2. Wharton, Conf. L. pp. 1108 et seq., and cases cited L.R.A. (N.S.)

ed. All of the questions raised as to the validity of the stipulation referred to, and its effect upon the case, are therefore to be determined by the laws of Oklahoma, and the defendant ought to have been allowed to introduce the stipulation in evidence, together with testimony as to the law there in force determining its validity and legal effect.

The force of the contention of defendant in error that, although such stipulations may be held valid by the law of Oklahoma in their application to cases generally, yet they may become, in their operation in particular cases, arbitrary and unreasonable limitations upon the liability of masters for the consequences of their own negligence; and that such is shown to be the case here must also be tested by the law of Oklahoma. That question has not been tried; the exclusion of the evidence offered having deprived the plaintiffs in error of any hearing upon it. No view that we might now take of the contention would sustain the action of the court below, and we cannot know what the developments of another trial may be. There is a further contention of the defendant in error that, because the notice was to be given in Topeka, Kansas, the contract was to be performed there, and that hence its validity should be tested by the laws of that state, as to which there were no allegation and proof. But this contention, at last, only goes to the legal effect of the stipulation upon plaintiff's right, and that is to be determined by the law from which the right must be derived,—that of Oklahoma. Besides, this stipulation was only an incidental part of the contract of service which was to be performed in the Indian territory and Oklahoma. The mere fact that the notice was to be received at a place in Kansas does not make the contract performable there in any such sense as to justify the inference that the parties intended to subject their rights to the laws of that state rather than to those of the place where the contract was made, where they were to remain, and where they were to do most of the things to be done in carrying out their engagements.

For the error in excluding the evidence, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

CHARLES POTTS, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

(— Tex. Crim. App. —, 97 S. W. 477.)

Appeal—instruction—error—preservation.

1. Exception during the trial or on mo-error for new trial is necessary to preserve the instructions to the jury for the consideration of the appellate court.

Intoxicating liquor—illegal sale—lager beer

2. One cannot be convicted of selling intoxicating liquors on the testimony of a witness that he bought from accused a beverage called "lager beer."

Same—intoxicating qualities.

3. To sustain a conviction for violation of the local-option law the liquid sold must be shown to have been of sufficient alcoholic body to produce intoxication if drunk in reasonable quantities.

(October 31, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Camp County Court convicting him of violating the local-option law. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. W. Balley and John W. Hooper for appellant.

Mr. J. E. Yantis for the State.

Case Note.—Is proof of sale of "lager beer" sufficient to sustain a conviction for unlawful sale of "intoxicating liquors," in the absence of proof that it is intoxicating:

—The case of POTTS v. STATE, in holding that proof of the sale of lager beer will not of itself establish the sale of intoxicating liquor, is interesting as a direct adjudication in support of a doctrine the authority as to which, as appears in the following cases, has heretofore consisted principally of dicta, pro and con.

In Rau v. People, 63 N. Y. 277, it was said: "The question is, whether lager beer is included in the words 'intoxicating liquors.' As to such well-known beverages as whisky, brandy, gin, ale, and strong beer, the courts without proof, acting upon their own knowledge derived from observation, will take notice that they are intoxicating, and will, therefore, require no proof of the fact. Nevin v. Ladue, 3 Denio, 437; Board of Excise v. Taylor, 21 N. Y. 173; People v. Wheelock, 3 Park. Crim. Rep. 9; Taylor v. People, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 347. But there are, doubtless, intoxicating beverages which are not so well known, and of whose character the courts could not take notice, and more intoxicating beverages may yet be discovered. As to all such, when one is charged with selling them in violation of law, there must be proof that they are intoxicating before a conviction can be had. Hitherto the courts have not been willing to take notice that lager beer is intoxicating, but have submitted the question, when controverted, to the jury, to be determined upon the evidence." The question presented for decision was, however, the propriety of a charge, where evidence had been given tending to prove such fact, that, if the jury found lager beer to be intoxicating, they should convict the defendant.

Davidson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was convicted of violating the local-option law.

It is contended: First, that the court erred in charging the jury that lager beer was an intoxicant; and second, that the evidence is not sufficient to support the conviction. Under the decisions of this court, error assigned in regard to the charge cannot be considered, as no exception was taken during the trial or on motion for new trial. Witness Cadenhead testified that he went to Pittsburg with Puckett. On reaching town, on the invitation of Puckett, he went to defendant's cold storage and he and Puckett drank "two bottles of beer." These were set out by appellant. Puckett presented defendant with a ticket which defendant punched. About an hour afterwards, on invitation of Puckett, appellant drank more beer. He inquired of Puckett how he managed to get the beer, and, being informed

L.R.A. 669, 22 N. E. 1049, it was held that proof of the sale of beer will not justify a charge that the purchaser drank intoxicating liquors in defendant's saloon, in an action to recover damages under the civil damage act; and it was said that lager beer is not to be deemed intoxicating without proof of the fact.

In People v. Schewe, 29 Hun, 122, and People v. Zeiger, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 355, the intoxicating properties of lager beer were held to be a question for the jury upon conflicting evidence submitted.

In Dillman v. People, 4 N. Y. Week. Dig. 251, it was held that lager beer, if proved intoxicating, is within the provisions of a statute against selling intoxicating liquors on Sunday.

In People v. Zeiger, supra, an instruction that the jury were to use their own knowledge and science if they possessed any; and the question was whether lager beer was an intoxicating liquor,—was held to be erroneous, for the reason that it might improperly influence the conclusions of the jury.

In People v. Hart, 24 How. Pr. 289, it was held that a warrant charging the sale of lager beer failed to charge an offense under a statute forbidding the sale in certain places of any wine, beer, strong or spirituous liquors, the court being unable to take judicial notice that lager beer belongs to the prohibited character or class.

In State v. Lager Beer, 70 N. H. 454, 49 Atl. 575, it is held that lager beer, if proved intoxicating, is subject to seizure and forfeiture under a statute providing for the seizure of all spirituous or intoxicating liquor kept for sale in violation of law.

As to the sufficiency of proof of the intoxicating property of lager beer which will warrant the submission of the question to the jury, see Killip v. McKay, 28 N. Y. Week. Dig. 119, 13 N. Y. S. R. 5, in which it that he would have to order it, he went to appellant and gave him an order "for a dozen bottles of beer," for which he paid $1.50. He paid the money, and called for three bottles, which he, Puckett, and King drank. Later this was repeated. When witness left he still had six unpunched numbers on his ticket, each of which called for a bottle of beer. This witness testified at this point as follows: "The beer was lager beer. I do not know the meaning of the word 'lager,' but they called it 'lager' beer." This is the testimony, and all of the testimony, upon which the conviction is predicated, as this was the only witness. If there is any testimony indicating that this was lager beer, or that the beer witness obtained was intoxicating, it is found in the statement above. We are of opinion that this is not sufficient to show intoxicating properties. The witness did not know that it was lager beer. His testimony states that when he bought it they called it "lager beer." We do not believe that the evidence is sufficient to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the mere statement that they called the beer he bought "lager beer" would, in fact, make it lager beer. Nor, under our decisions, are we prepared to hold that lager beer is judicially known to be an intoxicant, even if the testimony was clear and unequivocal that the bottles contained lager beer. The authorities are divided as to whether or not the court will take judicial cognizance that lager beer is an intoxicant, even when the evidence is clear and conclusive that the beer was lager beer. Speaking of lager beer, Mr. Black says, as to whether or not eviwas held that testimony by a witness who was in the habit of drinking ale, beer, and lager beer, that the liquor which he drank was one or the other of these kinds of beer, but which he could not say, tended to prove that the beer which he did drink possessed the properties of strong beer, which was intoxicating, and would warrant submission of the question to the jury; People v. Henschel, 35 N. Y. S. R. 275, 12 N. Y. Supp. 46, in which evidence that lager beer was intoxicating if one drank enough of it was held sufficient to make a case for the jury to pass upon.

On the other hand, in State v. Church, 6 S. D. 89, 60 N. W. 143, it was held that the refusal of an instruction that evidence of a sale of lager beer would not justify a conviction for unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor was not erroneous; the court saying: "We have no more hesitation in holding that the drink known as 'lager beer' is intoxicating than we should have in holding that 'spruce beer,' is not, and we should put both rulings upon the same ground. to wit, that such is the common understanding resulting from common observation."

A case indirectly bearing upon the question under consideration is State v. Giersch, 98 N. C. 720, 4 S. E. 193, in which, in passing upon the question whether the sale of lager beer and wine was within the statute prohibiting the sale of "spirituous liquors," the court said: "We know from common observation and knowledge, and it is a generally admitted physical fact not denied in this case, that lager beer and wine contain alcohol, and generally in such quantity and degree as to produce intoxication."

In Smith v. State, 113 Ga. 758, 39 S. E. 294, it was held that, while the words "lager beer," in their ordinary use and acceptance, may sufficiently indicate an intoxicating liquor to warrant a conviction of selling liquor of that character, when the proof shows a sale of lager beer and nothing more, yet, where there was affirmative testimony to the effect that a liquid which contained not exceeding 2 per cent of alcohol would not intoxicate, and that the identical bottle of liquid which the accused sold, and upon the sale of which the question of his guilt or innocence turned, did not contain more than 2 per cent of alcohol, it was, although there was other testimony to the effect that this identical liquid was lager beer, erroneous to charge generally that all lager beer is intoxicating.

In Bandalow v. People, 90 Ill. 218, a conviction for unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors upon proof of the sale of lager beer was sustained, no question appearing to have been raised as to its being intoxicating.

Care must be taken to note the difference between the question presented in the case in hand and in the foregoing decisions, and that which arises where the statute has the effect to raise a presumption that all fermented liquors are intoxicating until the contrary is proved, as is the case in Kansas (see State v. Volmer, 6 Kan. 371); or where the statute expressly includes all malt liquors (see Watson v. State, 55 Ala. 158; State v. Goyette, 11 R. I. 592; State v. Rush, 13 R. I. 198; State v. Gravelin, 16 R. I. 408, 16 Atl. 914; State v. Morehead, 22 R. I. 272, 47 Atl. 545, which hold that the courts will take judicial notice of the fact that lager beer is a malt liquor; Waller v. State, 38 Ark. 656, which holds that the fact that lager beer is a malt and fermented liquor was properly treated as a matter of common knowledge); or where the statute enumerates lager beer among the intoxicating liquors the traffic in which is regulated or prohibited, as is the case in Massachusetts (see Com. v. Leo, 110 Mass. 414; Com. v. Bloss, 116 Mass. 56); under which statutes a prima facie case may, of course, be made by proof of a sale of lager beer.

For a discussion of the constitutional right of a state to declare certain liquor intoxicating irrespective of its intoxicating character as a matter of fact, see case note appended to State v. Frederickson, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 186.

dence of its intoxicating properties is required: "The weight of authority appears to be with the cases holding that courts will take judicial notice that beer of this variety is intoxicating, and that it need not be shown to be so by evidence. But there are also decisions to the effect that lager beer must be shown to be capable of producing entire or partial intoxication, and that this is a fact to be ascertained by the jury upon the evidence in the case. In some of the earlier statutes and decisions similar questions arose in relation to the character and status of what was then denominated 'strong beer.' This term, though now practically obsolete, was once in familiar use as the name of a species of beer made of malt and hops, and so called in order to distinguish it from 'small beer,' which was compounded of molasses and yeast with the addition of either ginger or spruce, and which contained a very small percentage of alcohol. The 'strong beer' seems to have been rich in the intoxicating principle, chemical analysis (in one of the reported cases) showing the presence of alcohol in the proportion of 8 per cent; and the courts had no difficulty in determining that this particular beverage was an intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the statutes on that subject. But, as it differed from the lager beer of modern commerce both in the process of its manufacture and in the proportion of alcohol contained (the latter being a very much lighter fluid), the courts appear to be unwilling to be bound in their judicial dealings with beer of to-day by the precedents relating to the beer of a past generation. At least there are some decisions, particularly in New York, not explainable on any other hypothesis." In Massachusetts it was held that the fact that a given quantity of beer contains a certain percentage of alcohol, or that a gallon of beer contains as much alcohol as does a pint of whisky is not conclusive upon the question whether or not the beer is intoxicating. These quotations are from Black on Intoxicating Liquors, § 17, pp. 21, 22; and see foot notes for authorities cited.

The question has been before this court in quite a number of cases, under our local-option law, when the general term "beer" was used, and it has been invariably held that the court did not judicially know that the general term "beer" meant an intoxicating liquor. Nor do the decisions rest at that point. They go further and hold that, where a conviction is sought under the local-option law, the commodity sold must be shown to be intoxicating. Ex parte Gray (Tex. Crim. App.) 83 S. W. 828; Scales v. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

People*, 63 N. Y. 277; Blatz v. Rohrback, 116 N. Y. 450, 6 L.R.A. 669, 22 N. E. 1049; Sarlls v. United States, 162 U. S. 570, 38 L. ed. 556, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 720; Nevin v. Ladue, 3 Denio, 437; State v. Beswick, 13 R. I. 211, 43 Am. Rep. 26; Weis v. State, 3 Ind. 204; Kurz v. State, 79 Ind. 488; Klare v. State, 43 Ind. 483; State v. Sioux Falls Brewing Co. 5 S. D. 39, 26 L.R.A. 138, 58 N. W. 1; Hansberg v. People, 120 Ill. 21, 60 Am. Rep. 549, 8 N. E. 857; Netso v. State, 24 Fla. 363, 1 L.R.A. 825, 5 So. 8. The rule has been laid down differently where the general term "beer" is used. Some of these were under statutes peculiar to the states, or in the jurisdiction where the decisions were rendered, and it would be of practically little value to take these under consideration and show the difference where they exist. If the intoxicant charged to have been sold was whisky, or rum, or any beverage or fluid known and recognized generally as being intoxicating, and known to be by reason of the alcoholic body, the court would take judicial cognizance of the fact that it was intoxicating. An investigation of the different kinds and character of beer, and the alcoholic strength of these various liquids might be entertaining and interesting, but where the formula runs from about 1.6 per cent alcoholic strength to 4 and $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and the intoxicating properties depend upon the percentage, it would hardly require reasoning to show that the liquids sold, in order to come under the violation of the local-option law, must be of sufficient alcoholic body to produce intoxication if drunk in reasonable quantities. It has been the rule, where these lighter drinks have been relied upon to sustain a conviction in a local-option case, that it must be made to appear that the liquid was intoxicating within the rule just announced. If not, then the law has not been violated. The mere fact that the party drank a bottle of beer, and he called it "lager beer," is not, in our judgment, sufficient to authorize the court to instruct the jury that the liquid was intoxicating. There must be evidence of the fact that it was an intoxicant. The presumption of innocence should be overcome by proof of sufficient cogency to exclude the reasonable doubt of that innocence. In the particular case in hand, the only evidence, sifted to its final analysis, is the witness's statement that they called it "lager beer," but that he did not know what the word "lager" meant. He was not even asked, nor did he testify, as to any effect it had upon him. He states that he drank two bottles of beer with Puckett, and that he and King and Puckett drank six bottles that he purchased from appellant. Yet he was not asked, nor does he testify, that it had any effect upon him in the direction of intoxication. The decisions of this state have rather rigidly held to the proposition that we would sustain convictions for the sale of intoxicants in violation of the local-option law whenever the ingredients were shown to be an intoxicant, without reference to its name or supposed quality. If the fact was made to appear that the liquid was an intoxicant, and that such was, or would be, its effect if drunk in reasonable quantities, we have sustained convictions, so far as the weight of the testimony is concerned. We believe this to be a wise and salutary rule in the enforcement of this law. It is not the name they call the liquid, but its quality and its strength when viewed as an intoxicant. For the court to hold that Frosty, Uno, Ino, Hiawatha, and the various other brands of fermented liquors shipped into local-option territory are not, per se, intoxicating, would lay down a rather dangerous precedent for the enforcement of this law. It would be a very easy matter for those who desire to evade its provisions to put one of these labels upon the bottles. The law would be rapidly brought into disrepute and with facility evaded. On the other hand, it might be dangerous to the liberty of the citizenship of the country to hold that, because they called it "lager beer," or that it was labeled "lager beer," or that in fact it was "lager beer," it was therefore an intoxicant. It might not be, and the citizen would be unjustly punished. It is a matter of proof whether it is or not intoxicating. Therefore we are of opinion that the evidence in the record is not sufficient to justify an affirmation of this case. If the contents of these bottles were intoxicating, it was a matter easily susceptible of proof. Certainly a man who testifies before the court to drinking as many as six bottles of what they called "lager beer" would be able to know whether or not it had an intoxicating effect upon him, yet this record is wanting in any testimony intimating such a result.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WASHINGTON EX REL.
MARION E. HARLAND

v.

CENTRALIA-CHEHALIS ELECTRIC RAILWAY & POWER COMPANY.

(42 Wash. 632, 85 Pac. 344.)

Eminent domain—premature exercise.

1. That a street railway company had not in fact secured its right of way and necessary franchises will not prevent an exercise by it of the power of eminent domain to secure power to operate the road, if it is proceeding diligently with the enterprise, and has proceeded far enough to demonstrate that its immediate purpose is to apply the power sought to a public use.

Same—public and private use.

2. Authority to condemn property for the public uses recited in the charter of a corporation will not be denied because a portion of the enterprises in which it is authorized to engage are merely private, where the two are not so combined as to be inseparable.

Same—adjoining property.

3. An electric railway company is not, in securing property necessary for power purposes, limited to that adjacent to its right of way, under a statute empowering it to appropriate land for right of way and "other corporate purposes" without limitation as to locality.

(May 19, 1906.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of certiorari to review proceedings condemning land for the use of the defendant corporation. Judgment affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. S. Elliott and E. M. Green for relator.

Mr. W. W. Langhorne, for respondent:

That the right of way and franchises had not been secured did not defeat the right to exercise the power of eminent domain.

Case Note.—Right to exercise eminent domain as affected by the extent to which the general scheme has progressed:—

In order to exercise the power of eminent domain all the requirements of the statute granting the power must, of course, be strictly complied with; but, assuming that the petitioner has complied with all the statutory requirements, there sometimes, as in the foregoing case, arises a question whether or not the general scheme of his undertaking has progressed to such an extent as to give him the right to exercise that power to take particular lands.

This question most frequently arises where the consent of the state, or of a municipal corporation, is necessary for the accomplishment of the undertaking, and the right of way through private lands is sought by condemnation proceedings before such consent is obtained. Most of the cases hold that such consent is not a condition precedent, and agree with STATE EX REL. HARLAND v. CENTRALIA-CHEHALIS ELECTRIC R. & P. Co. that the courts cannot dictate the order in which the petitioner shall proceed to acquire property or rights. Thus, in Union P. R. Co. v. Colorado Postal Tele. Cable Co. 30 Colo. 133, 97 Am. St. Rep. 106, 69 Pac. 564, it was held that the fact that leave to erect a telegraph line through certain incorporated towns along the proposed right of way had not been secured from the municipal authorities was not sufficient to prevent the telegraph company from condemning the right of way of a railroad for its poles. So, also, in Ligare v. Chicago, M. & N. R. Co. 166 Ill. 249, 46 N. E. 803, it was held that the consent of a city was not a necessary prerequisite for the exercise of a statutory right to condemn private property within the city for the right of way of a railroad company organized under the laws of the state. And to the same effect was the decision in Chicago & W. I. R. Co. v. Dunbar, 100 Ill. 110, where the court said that the law had provided one mode of acquiring the right of way across private property and another way of acquiring the right of way across streets, but had in no way provided the order in which the railroad company should proceed in acquiring its right of way. And in Clarke v. South Kingstown, 18 R. I. 283, 27 Atl. 336, it was held that it was not necessary to obtain the consent of the general assembly of the state to allow a highway over the lands of the state, before proceedings might be maintained to condemn the lands of private persons. And in Metropolitan City R. Co. v. Chicago West Div. R. Co. 87 Ill. 317, obtaining the consent of the common council of the city to allow tracks of the petitioner's railway in a given street was held not a condition precedent to condemning such property, right, interest, or privilege as another railway company might have previously acquired by contract or otherwise in such street. In California Southern R. Co. v. Kimball, 61 Cal. 91, it was held that, although a railroad could not lay its tracks in the public streets of a city unless the right to use the same was granted by the city, it did not follow that an action to condemn whatever rights the owners of the land lying adjacent to said street might have therein could not be maintained before the city had granted a right of way over the streets.

But to the contrary was the decision in Wisconsin Water Co. v. Winans, 85 Wis. 26, 20 L.R.A. 662, 39 Am. St. Rep. 813, 54 N. W. 1003, where it was held that condemnation of land for a pipe line, by a water-supply company formed under the general laws to convey water to a city, could not be had where it was not shown that the company had a legal right to enter upon or condemn lands in such city, or had already acquired the right to construct or maintain any waterworks therein, or to sell or dispose of water to its inhabitants; since the public use which would justify condemnation depended upon the disposal of the water after it reached the city. In Rahn Twp. v. Tamaqua & L. Street R. Co. 4 Pa. Dist. R. 29, it was held that, where the railroad company had a charter to construct a road from one borough to another through a township, the company would not be allowed to construct the road through the township until it had secured the consent of the local authorities of the boroughs to run its railroad within their limits.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent, the Centralia-Chehalis Electric Railway & Power Company, is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Washington. The objects for which the corporation was formed, as recited in its articles, are many and somewhat varied, and those of a public and quasi public nature are commingled with those that are purely private. Its primary purpose, however, according to the testimony of its promoter, is to build, equip, and operate electric street railways in the cities of Chehalis and Centralia, and an electric railway between those two cities, to be connected to and operated with the street railways, for the purposes of carrying passengers and freight for hire. For the purpose of generating the necessary electric current to operate its railways the respondent sought to create a water power on the Chehalis river. It purposes to erect at the site selected a dam across the river some 60 or 65 feet high, which will at once create the necessary fall for power purposes and provide a storage basin, which can be drawn upon during the dry season, when the natural flow of the river may be insufficient to produce the required power. The dam, when constructed, will cause the water to back up and overflow a considerable area of land not now covered by water, a part of which belongs to the relator. The respondent was unable to agree with the relator as to the compensation to be paid for the land taken and damaged belonging to him, and brought an action to condemn under the statutes of eminent domain. After a hearing the court made the preliminary order adjudging the use to which the respondent intended to apply the property to be a public use, that a necessity existed for its taking, and ordered the question of the amount of compensation to be paid the relator to be submitted to the determination of a jury. This proceeding was brought to review that order.

The relator first contends that the use to which the respondent contemplates putting the property is not a public use. The relator does not deny, of course, that the operation of a system of electric railway between and within the cities of Centralia and Chehalis for the purposes of carrying passengers and freight for hire would be a public use within the meaning of the statutes and the improvement, it was held, in State, Vanderbeck, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 29 N. J. L. 441, that a right of way for a sewer could be condemned by the water commissioners of the city before the canal was constructed.

It was held error in Prescott Irrig. Co. v. Flathers, 20 Wash. 454, 55 Pac. 635, to require an irrigation company to show that it had condemned or purchased the right to take water from all the riparian owners of a whole river, before proceeding to acquire a right of way for its canal. And in Stoughton v. Paul, 173 Mass. 148, 53 N. E. 272, it was held that it was not necessary for a water company to secure the right to take water from a stream, before securing the right of way for its pipes by condemnation.

In New York, where the statute provides that a water company which holds a contract to furnish water to an incorporated village may condemn lands for a right of way, it has been held that the possession of such a contract is a condition precedent to the exercise of the right. Citizens' Waterworks Co. v. Parry, 59 Hun, 202, 13 N. Y. Supp. 490, Affirmed in 128 N. Y. 669, 29 N. E. 148; Witcher v. Holland Waterworks Co. 66 Hun, 619, 20 N. Y. Supp. 560, Affirmed in 142 N. Y. 626, 37 N. E. 565.

That a city was without funds to pay for the land was held, in Re Cedar Rapids, 85 Iowa, 39, 51 N. W. 1142, to be no defense to condemnation proceedings to secure land for purposes of a public park. But in Coburn v. Ames, 52 Cal. 385, 28 Am. Rep. 634, it was held that the petition must show that there were sufficient funds in the treasury applicable for that purpose, where the statute providing for the condemnation of lands for a highway required them to be paid for from the road fund.

That the time given by ordinance of a borough for the construction of a railroad had expired was held, in Brinkerhoff v. Newark & H. Traction Co. 66 N. J. L. 478, 49 Atl. 812, to be no defense to an action to condemn property, as the borough might acquiesce in and consent to the delay, and it alone could object.

The fact that a foreign railway corporation had not built its road up to the boundary line of the state was held, in St. Louis, K. C. & C. R. Co. v. Lewright, 113 Mo. 660, 21 S. W. 210, not sufficient to prevent the corporation from condemning lands within the state.

Constitution; nor does he contend that it is beyond the powers of the court to condemn his land for the purposes of creating the necessary power to operate that system. But he says that the respondent has not proceeded far enough with its scheme to demonstrate that it will be permitted to construct and operate its proposed railways, since it was made to appear by the evidence that it had not procured franchises from the cities of Centralia and Chehalis permitting it to construct its proposed railways within their boundaries, nor a complete right of way between the two cities. The relator argues that, inasmuch as the respondent cannot construct its proposed road until it procures these franchises and this right of way, it is not in a position to say that this power will be needed by it at all, and hence it ought not to be permitted to condemn his land until it is certain that the land will be needed. On the question of the progress the respondent had made in this direction, the record disclosed that it had procured a right of way for its road over all the distance between the two cities, except over a tract about 80 rods in width, and that for this it was negotiating with the owner who was a resident of another county. It appeared, also, that it was then negotiating with each of the cities for franchises; that in each of them the terms of the franchise to be granted had been practically agreed upon, and that ordinances had been drawn and introduced granting to the respondent a franchise in accordance with those terms which had passed to the second reading, and that in one of the cities it had deposited a considerable sum, to be forfeited in case it did not carry out the conditions imposed by the franchise which might be granted it. In fact, it was admitted by the relator on the hearing that the respondent was proceeding diligently in its effort to put itself in a position to commence at once the mechanical construction of its road. It seems to us that the respondent had proceeded far enough to show that its immediate purpose was to apply the power it sought to create by the appropriation of the relator's property to a public use. This was its declared purpose, and its acts, in so far as it had actually proceeded, pointed to that end. Moreover, it is manifest that an enterprise of this character cannot be completed all at once. Being made up of several parts, it must be completed in parts. Why, then, should one part be deemed of more importance than another? Why may not the city as well say that it will not grant the franchise until the respondent has produced the power, as the court may say that it will not grant the right to procure the power until the franchise is granted? 7 L.R.A. (N.S.),

If the city did so say, and the court should hold with the relator, it is plain that the enterprise has reached a point beyond which it cannot proceed. But we think there is no reason for such a holding. We think that when it is made to appear that a promoter of an enterprise of this kind is proceeding diligently with it, and nothing is shown to have occurred that will prevent its ultimate accomplishment, the court ought not to deny the right to acquire by condemnation an essential part merely because there is a possibility that the enterprise cannot be carried to completion. There is no danger that the property condemned will be applied to uses foreign to the purposes for which it is condemned. The property does not become the private property of the condemning corporation, in the sense that it can appropriate it to uses of a private nature. It must use it for the purposes for which it condemns it, or else submit to its reversion at the suit of the state. People ex rel. Robinson v. Pittsburgh R. Co. 53 Cal. 694; 2 Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 594 et seq.

The relator next contends that the respondent should not be permitted to exercise the right of eminent domain because its articles of incorporation show that some of the objects for which it was incorporated are purely of a private nature, and that to permit it to condemn property at all is to permit private property to be taken for a private use. There are cases which maintain the doctrine that a statute authorizing the condemnation of property for uses a part of which only are of a public nature is in violation of the rule that private property cannot be taken for private use, and hence cannot be enforced. Gaylord v. Sanitary District, 204 Ill. 576, 63 L.R.A. 582, 98 Am. St. Rep. 235, 68 N. E. 522; Ryerson v. Brown, 35 Mich. 333, 24 Am. Rep. 564. And there are cases which deny the right to condemn when the avowed purpose as set out in the petition is to condemn for uses some of which are private. Harding v. Goodlett, 3 Yerg. 41, 24 Am. Dec. 546. But in this case the respondent asks in its petition to condemn for the public uses only recited in its articles of incorporation, making no mention of those which are purely private. If a private use is combined with a public one in such a way that the two cannot be separated, then unquestionably the right of eminent domain could not be invoked to aid the enterprise; but it has been said, and it seems to us that it is the better reason, that, where the two are not so combined as to be inseparable, the good may be separated from the bad, and the right exercised for the uses that are public. Lake Koen Nav. Reservoir & Irrig. Co. v. Klein, 63 Kan. 484, 65 Pac.

684; Brown v. Gerald, 100 Me. 351, 70 L.R. A. 472, 109 Am. St. Rep. 526, 61 Atl. 785. In the first of these cases the court said: "We see no greater reason for denying to a private corporation the power of eminent domain for the promotion of a public use, because by its charter it is also authorized to engage in a private enterprise, than to deny to a private person the same power because he is inherently endowed with the same authority." Furthermore, it was held in the case of Re Niagara Falls & W. R. Co. 108 N. Y. 375, 15 N. E. 429, that, in determining the question of public use, "the courts are not confined to, and it is not to be tested exclusively by, the description of those objects and purposes as set forth in the articles of association; but evidence aliunde, showing the actual business proposed to be conducted, may be considered." And, this being true, we think it must be true, also, that when a corporation, whose articles disclose purposes some of which are public and some of which are not, seeks to exercise the right of eminent domain, we may look to its application and the evidence introduced at the hearing to determine what its real purposes are. Measured by this test, there can be no question as to the purposes of the respondent corporation; for both its application and the testimony show that it desires this power that it may further its business as a common carrier. But, while the exercise of this right of eminent domain must be guarded jealously, so that the private property of one person may not be taken for the private use of another, after all is said and done, the power to prevent property taken for a public use from being subsequently diverted to a private use must rest rather in the supervisory control of the state than in caution in permitting the exercise of the power. Property taken for a public use by a corporation organized solely to promote a public business may be as easily diverted by it to a private use as it may by one having both public and private objects. It is not the object for which a corporation is formed that prevents it from wrong doing. The preventive rests in the power of the state to compel the lawful exercises of its granted privileges.

It is next said that there is no proof that the necessities of the respondent require the use of all of the property it proposes to take. It is true that the evidence does not give the estimated horse power required to operate the respondent's proposed public facilities, nor does it give an estimate of the horse power it is proposed to develop; but the president of the company, while testifying, stated generally that all that could be developed by the dam proposed would be required, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) and that, if the company could get along with less, it would be satisfied to take less. Inasmuch as there was no evidence offered to controvert this statement, we think it is sufficient to justify the finding that no more is proposed to be taken than the necessities require.

Finally, it is said that nothing but land adjacent to the right of way may be taken for the use of a railway company, and that the lands in question here are not adjacent to the railway the respondent proposes to construct. Under the earlier statutes relating to eminent domain, there would be much in this contention; but the several subsequent statutes conferring the power of eminent domain on electric railway companies provide that they shall have the right to appropriate lands for a right of way and "other corporate purposes," without limitation as to the locality. See Laws 1903, chap. 175, § 2, p. 366. It seems to us that this is broad enough to permit the condemnation of land for power purposes, however distant it may be from the proposed railway. Contrary to the statement of the relator that the public have no interest in the cost of the power the respondent uses to operate its railway, we think the public have a vital interest in that cost. The public is interested in cheap transportation, and, since the use of the facilities nature has afforded will help acquire cheap transportation, the law should be construed rather to enable their use than to permit them to waste in idleness. The principle is distinguishable from the principle of the cases holding that a station for a power house or coal beds cannot be condemned. In this case there is no other source from which power can be derived without an expense which is prohibitive of the enterprise, while in the other cases the situation was wanted because of its convenience, not because of necessity.

The order of the court will stand affirmed.

FRANK WILMOT et al., Appts.,
v.

OREGON RAILROAD & NAVIGATION COMPANY, Resp't.

(— Or. —, 87 Pac. 528.)

Depot grounds—question for jury.

1. The question whether or not the point where animals killed on a railroad track entered thereon was a part of depot grounds is for the jury, where the evidence is conflicting, or different inferences might be drawn from it.

Same—definition.

2. The depot grounds of a railway company are the place where passengers get on and off the trains, and where freight is loaded and unloaded, and include all grounds reasonably necessary and convenient for that purpose, together with the necessary tracks, switches, and turnouts thereon or adjacent thereto for handling and making up trains, storage of cars, and the like, and so much of the main track outside the switches as is requisite for the proper handling of trains at the station.

Same—presumption.

3. The appropriation, survey, and setting apart of land by a railroad company for depot purposes afford strong, if not conclusive, evidence that its boundaries and extent are such as, and no more than, are necessary and proper; and the limits should not be curtailed or extended by the court or jury unless in a very clear case.

Same—killing animals—question for jury.

4. Whether or not the turning of horses out to graze upon uninclosed land near a depot is such contributory negligence as will preclude a recovery in case they wander onto the tracks and are killed is a question for the jury.

I. The principle involved.

A very clearly defined principle regulates this question,—the principle of the paramount importance of the public good or convenience over private rights. Fence laws have been passed very generally in all parts of the country, compelling railroad companies to fence their tracks in order to protect individuals from injuries to their stock straying thereon. But at stations where the general public has a right of access, and the necessary transactions of the road require it, an exception, either by express language in the statute, or by construction of the courts, has come to be made in almost every instance to the general obligation to fence, on the ground that the public right of access overrules the private right of protection. The question, then, of how far this exception to the obligation to fence extends, or, in other words, how far or what are station or depot grounds, is decided by determining how far the public convenience requires an open track.

There is another reason why, in the vicinity of stations, railroad companies are sometimes exempt from fencing, at first glance identified with the one under consideration, but in reality quite distinct, and that is that the safety of employees in making up trains requires, under some conditions, a clear and open track, free especially from cattle guards, which are included under the general term of fencing as used in the statute. In some instances the courts have, in determining the question under consideration, intermingled those two principles in coming to their decision, and those cases have necessarily been included herein; but, where the question of the safety of employees alone has been involved, the line of exclusion has been drawn.

The following cases present the principle involved in the question under discussion:

The failure to fence is excusable only to an extent sufficient to afford the public and the railroad company necessary facilities for transacting the business reasonably to be expected at the locality in question. While the railroad company would be excused from fencing a sufficient portion of its right of way to allow the public access to the loading and unloading facilities there provided, it would not be excused from a failure to fence another or greater space. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Sevcek (Neb.) 101 N. W. 981.

Public convenience is the limit of the exception exempting railroads from the obligation of fencing station grounds. Greeley v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 33 Minn. 136, 53 Am. Rep. 16, 22 N. W. 179.

So much of the grounds and side tracks connected with the depot as is reasonably necessary for the business of the public with the railroad company at the station should be free of access, and unobstructed by fences or cattle guards. Prickett v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 33 Kan. 748, 7 Pac. 611.

Save so far as is necessary to afford convenient and suitable access to station or depot grounds, the road must be protected by guards and fences. Kobe v. Northern P. R. Co. 36 Minn. 518, 32 N. W. 783.

A railroad company may leave a sufficient space open about depots for the safe and commodious transaction of the business of the station. McGuire v. St. Louis, M. & S. E. R. Co. 113 Mo. App. 79, 87 S. W. 564.

to recover the value of horses alleged to have been killed by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George W. Joseph and Thomas M. Dill for appellants.

Messrs. W. W. Cotton and Arthur C. Spencer, for respondent:

The place where the horses entered upon the tracks of the defendant was within its depot grounds.

Harvey v. Southern P. Co. 46 Or. 505, 80 Pac. 1061; Grondin v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 100 Mich. 599, 59 N. W. 229; Rinear v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 70 Mich. 620, 38 N. W. 599; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Rowland, 50 Ind. 349; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Willis, 93 Ind. 507; Moses v. Southern P. R. Co. 18 Or. 385, 8 L.R.A. 135, 23 Pac. 498.

A railroad company is not required to fence such grounds as are necessary to remain open for the use of the public. Crenshaw v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 54 Mo. App. 233.

The necessities of the public, of the employees, and of the company, require that depot grounds remain open and unobstructed. Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Newbrander, 40 Ohio St. 15.

II. In general; illustrative cases.

a. In general.

The provisions of the fencing act do not relate to depots and stations, or to grounds immediately surrounding them. The point where the animal was killed in this instance was upon the main track only a few feet from the depot building. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. House, 96 Tenn. 552, 35 S. E. 561.

A railroad company is not liable, except for negligence, for killing stock by reason of a failure to fence between a public road and the station, when that would prevent the public from getting to and from the station. Robertson v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 64 Mo. 412.

Where the evidence showed that a cow got on the track over a switch used for loading and unloading freight and near a depot, the company is not liable in the absence of negligence. Robinson v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 21 Mo. App. 141.

So, where the side of a spur track in the vicinity of a station could not have been fenced without inconvenience to the business interests of the road, there is no obligation to fence. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Kneadle, 94 Ind. 454.

A railroad company is not legally bound to fence its road in the vicinity of a depot where switches and side tracks are maintained, and large shipments made. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Skelton, 94 Ind. 222.

Proof that land where a cow was killed was opposite to and adjoining depot grounds, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

When depot grounds are appropriated and set apart by a railroad company, their limits cannot be curtailed or extended by a jury in a proceeding where they come collaterally in question.

Scott v. Astoria & C. River R. Co. 43 Or. 31, 62 L.R.A. 543, 99 Am. St. Rep. 710, 72 Pac. 594; McGrath v. Detroit, M. & M. R. Co. 57 Mich. 557, 24 N. W. 854; Rabidon v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 115 Mich. 390, 39 L.R.A. 405, 73 N. W. 386; Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Campbell, 47 Mich. 265, 11 N. W. 152.

Where the facts as to the point of entry are not disputed, the question as to whether said place is within the depot grounds of the railroad company is a question of law for the court to determine.

and was necessarily to be, and had for years been, used as a public passage; and that the public would otherwise be seriously inconvenienced in doing business with the railroad company,—was declared to tend to prove that the point was one which the company was under no obligation to fence under the statute. Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Crandall, 58 Ind. 365.

Where the place at which stock entered upon a track was one used by the public in receiving and loading freight, it must be held part of the depot grounds necessary for the use of the road by the public, and excepted from the operation of the fence laws. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Blair, 75 Ill. App. 659.

Where a railroad company has a number of tracks, side tracks, and switches running out from a station, upon which cars are stored, iced, inspected, and switched, the premises are railroad yards within the meaning of the fence laws. Bird v. Michigan C. R. Co. (Mich.) 13 Det. L. N. 639, 108 N. W. 1100.

Evidence that at a point near a switch the diverging lines of track are so near together as to make loading operations inconvenient will not be sufficient to show that proper depot grounds may not include such point. Cole v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 104 Wis. 460, 80 N. W. 736.

A point 160 to 200 yards distant from a station house was not strictly within the station grounds, but constituted an approach to them, and could not have been fenced without incommoding the company and the public in the transaction of the freight business of the road. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Campbell, 47 Mich. 265, 11 N. W. 152.

In ascertaining what portion of its ground at stations should be left open in order to enable it properly to perform its duty to the public, the safety to employees must also be taken into account; therefore, in arranging the switch yards the company may properly keep in view the safety of the employees. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Umphenour, 63 Ill. App. 642.

McGrath v. Detroit, M. & M. R. Co.; and Rabidon v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co.—supra; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Whalen, 42 Ill. 396.

The space between switch stands is within the depot grounds.

Eaton v. McNeill, 31 Or. 128, 49 Pac. 875; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Roper, 47 Ill. App. 320.

A passing track is a part of, and must be held to be within, the depot grounds.

McGrath v. Detroit M. & M. R. Co. 57 Mich. 559, 24 N. W. 854; Rinear v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 70 Mich. 621, 38 N. W. 599.

At least as much of the main line and grounds outside of the switches as is in actual use for reaching side tracks within the switches is a part of the station grounds, to which the statutory requirement to fence does not apply.

"Three conditions must concur to constitute the particular grounds depot grounds, within the contemplation of the law. They must be necessary, convenient, and actually used for the purposes of depot grounds. They must be necessary. This, no doubt, is to be interpreted as meaning reasonably necessary. It is not enough that they are convenient and actually used; they must be reasonably necessary as well." Grosse v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 91 Wis. 482, 65 N. W. 185.

The question arose in the lower court, in Latty v. Burlington, C. R. & M. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 250, as to whether a point in question was a station, and whether the grounds around it were to be regarded as depot grounds. The court, on appeal, says merely in passing that point: "Evidence was introduced as to their use and the business there transacted, which need not be stated."

There was no obligation to fence at a point near the station house and wood and coal houses, which were located on opposite sides of the main track and between side tracks, in Durand v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Iowa, 559.

A railroad company cannot be required to fence so as to cut itself off from its wood yards. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Beaty, 36 Ind. 19.

So, a railroad company is not required to fence its road in the immediate vicinity of its engine house, and machine shop, car house, wood house, and wood yard. Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. Oestel, 20 Ind. 231.

Where an animal entered upon the track from a point customarily and necessarily used by the company for the storage of wood hauled there by farmers for shipment, and the station buildings and side tracks were in the vicinity, the point in question, by reason of the public convenience, must be regarded as public depot grounds. Hopper v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 37 Minn. 52, 33 N. W. 314.

A water tank 530 feet easterly from a depot, near which is a switch, and beyond 360 feet is another switch, warehouses being 107 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Grondin v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 100 Mich. 598, 59 N. W. 229.

The criterion is whether, in view of the present or prospective needs of such grounds for station or depot purposes, the company has used a reasonable discretion in throwing them open for that purpose.

Rinear v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 70 Mich. 620, 38 N. W. 599; Davis v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 26 Iowa, 551.

Bean, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover the value of four horses killed by the moving trains of the defendant on an unfenced portion of its track, but which the plaintiffs claim and allege should have been fenced.

The complaint states a cause of action cated on the side track, is clearly within the depot-ground limits. Harvey v. Southern P. Co. 46 Or. 505, 80 Pac. 1061.

A railroad company is not required to fence along a highway abutting upon an open space south of the main track and the depot and between that and the switch and cattle pens which extend to within a short distance of the highway. Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Quick, 109 Ind. 295, 9 N. E. 788, 925.

A railroad company is not bound to fence along its track on either side between its depot and cattle yards, when a side track extends from its depot 250 yards, and, in connection with the side track, stock pens are maintained. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Nice, 99 Ind. 152.

A depot is a place where passengers get on and off the cars, and where goods are loaded and unloaded; and all grounds necessary or convenient and actually used for these purposes are included in depot grounds. Perhaps, also, as the engine is frequently supplied with wood and water at such places, so much ground as is necessary and used for those purposes, where wood and water are taken at a depot, should be included in depot grounds. Fowler v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 21 Wis. 77; Plunkett v. Minneapolis, S. Ste. M. & A. R. Co. 79 Wis. 222, 48 N. W. 519; Grosse v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 91 Wis. 485, 65 N. W. 185.

It was held unreasonable in Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Rowland, 50 Ind. 349, to require a railroad company to fence its track at a point paralleled by a side track, and in the immediate vicinity of which were a hay press and sawmill, depot and yards. The following instruction was declared correct: "Neither does the law require a railway company to build and maintain a fence at a point where, by so doing, it will interfere with the free use of a switch or side track constituting a part of the road; nor is such company bound to build or maintain a fence at a point on its road where it will interfere with the free use of a piece or parcel of ground kept and used by the company as for common-law negligence, and also under the statute making a railway company liable for stock killed on an unfenced track. The court below, in accordance with the doctrine approved in Harvey v. Southern P. Co. 46 Or. 505, 80 Pac. 1061, required plaintiffs to elect upon which cause of action they would proceed, and they elected to rely upon the statutory liability. The defense is that the animals entered upon the track at the depot grounds of the defendant, and that plaintiffs were guilty of such contributory negligence in suffering and permitting them to run at large at the place where they were killed as will bar a recovery. The defendant owns and operates a railroad from Portland to the eastern boundary of the state. Bridal Veil is a station between Portland and The Dalles, used principally for the shipment of lumber. It consists of station grounds, a depot building, side track, switches and turnouts necessary and proper for the handling of the business at that point. A switch or side track used by it in the transaction of its business leaves the main track at a point 200 or 300 feet east of the depot building, and, passing south of such building, intersects the main track again about 1,800 feet west thereof. Along this side track are situated the planing mill, lumber yards, sheds, and other buildings of the lumber company. In 1902, the defendant constructed on the north side of the main track a passing track 3,000 feet long which commences about 700 or 800 feet west of the depot building and opposite the lumber plata coal and wood yard; nor when it will interfere with the free use of a yard or lot kept for the purpose of loading or unloading staves, lumber, timber, wood, or other kinds of freight shipped, or to be shipped, on the cars of the company. . . . But whenever a company can build and maintain a fence without interfering with the rights of the public, or with the free use of property belonging to private individuals, or of its own property, then it is bound to maintain a fence, whether it be in a town or village, or in the country."

Distance from depots is not the controlling consideration in determining depot grounds. Neither does the question of frequent or infrequent use for switching purposes control. The question is, Are they reasonably necessary for that purpose, or liable to become so? Rabidon v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 115 Mich. 390, 39 L.R.A. 405, 73 N. W. 386.

A point over a mile from the freight and passenger station in a thickly populated community is not so far as to be outside the yard limits, if it is within the limits reasonably set by the company, and the fence and guards at that point would render switching and management of trains dangerous to employees. Ibid.

The public convenience requires that at stations or sidings where freight or passengers are received or discharged the approach to the road should be free and unobstructed by a fence. In this instance the unfenced siding was 1,320 feet in length, but the court said that it could not say that it was longer than the convenience and necessities of the business required. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Christy, 43 Ind. 143.

It would be unreasonable to require a railroad company to fence its road between the crossing of a county road and its depot, the county road being over 2,000 feet north of the depot, when it could not do so without unjustly interfering with the proper and legitimate use of its property. Cincinnati, R. & Ft. W. R. Co. v. Wood, 82 Ind. 593.

But where a crossing was a quarter of a mile east of a depot, and the point where an animal was killed east of that, and between a switch maintained for the use only of a tile factory, a judgment for damages will not be disturbed. Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Fly, 8 Ind. App. 602, 36 N. E. 215.

And that part of a track extending through the addition to a city, to a bridge across a river and east from a railroad crossing at right angles, is not exempt from fencing when all of the shifting and switching of cars was done west of the railroad crossing. Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Cupp, 9 Ind. App. 244, 36 N. E. 445.

And where the evidence showed that a railroad company had a station at a small town, and that stock was killed 1¼ miles west thereof, the jury was warranted in presuming that the depot grounds did not extend that distance. Smith v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 60 Iowa, 512, 15 N. W. 303.

So, a point more than a mile distant from a depot, and which is not necessarily used by the railroad company in making up trains, although sometimes convenient for that purpose, is not within the exception to the obligation to fence. Union P. R. Co. v. Knowlton, 43 Neb. 751, 62 N. W. 203.

So, where there was a depot one side of a highway crossing and no fence 300 feet the other side, failure to fence beyond the crossing is not excused by proof that some freight was received and discharged there. Moser v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 42 Minn. 480, 44 N. W. 530.

And it is the duty of a railroad company to fence at a point connected with its station grounds but bounded by private property, and where a fence might have been maintained without inconvenience to the public or danger to employees. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Sevcek (Neb.) 101 N. W. 981.

Conflicting decisions.

Two decisions, one in Texas and one in New York, are not in line with the otherwise thoroughly settled doctrine.

Stock was killed near a depot at a point where a switch track was located, in Housform of the lumber company and extends about 2,200 feet east of the depot. About 100 feet east of this passing track the defendant constructed a cattle guard with fences connected therewith on either side. From this point east the track is fenced, but it is not inclosed between the cattle guard and the west end of the depot grounds. The plaintiffs live and are in business at Bridal Veil. On the evening of April 11, 1904, they turned their horses out to graze on the uninclosed lands south of the depot as they had been accustomed to do for some time. During the night the horses strayed onto the track of the defendant, and were killed by its moving trains. The evidence tended to show that the horses entered upon the track west of the east end of the passing track, but were run down and killed east of of the cattle guard. The court below directed a nonsuit on the ground that the place of entry was within the depot grounds of the defendant and at a place it was not required to fence. The statute makes a railroad company liable for the value of stock killed by its moving trains, engines, or cars, upon or near an unfenced track (Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 5139), and is broad enough to include animals killed at the depot grounds. It has, however, been held that the statute did not extend to depot grounds because the purposes for which they are used and the right of public convenience are inconsistent with the obligation to fence at that point. Moses v. Southern P. R. Co. 18 Or. 385, 8 L.R.A. 135, 23 Pac. 498; Sulliton & T. C. R. Co. v. Simpson, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 670. It was proved that to have the road fenced at that point would cause much inconvenience in handling trains; but the court held that not a valid excuse for failing to fence the road, since, if so, it would virtually destroy the efficiency of the statute making it negligence per se to injure stock when the track is not fenced.

So, when the statute provides for cattle guards at all road crossings, road crossings adjacent to the station buildings of a railroad company cannot be held exempt from its purview. The court has no right to create exceptions, and say that, because a railroad company chooses to locate its station buildings not on, but near, a public highway crossing, and that thereby cattle guards may inconvenience it and the public, it is not bound to maintain them. Inconvenience is no excuse to them for omitting a plain statutory duty. Bradley v. Buffalo, N. Y. & E. R. Co. 34 N. Y. 427.

b. Extension beyond town limits.

The side tracks of a railroad company connected with a station, which are necessary for the transaction of the public business of the railroad, need not be fenced, even when part of them extend outside the corporate limits. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Hogan, 27 Neb. 801, 43 N. W. 1148.

So in a later hearing in the same case, reported in 30 Neb. 686, 46 N. W. 1015, it was held that a railroad company need not fence that part of its station grounds extending outside the limits of a city, town, or village, when such grounds are necessary for the proper transaction of its business as a common carrier.

So, it is for the jury to say whether a point where there are several tracks or switches used in connection with the station, but outside the limits of a town, is a part of the depot grounds because the transaction of business with the public requires that it be left open. Bean v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 20 Mo. App. 641.

And so, where, outside of village limits, but adjacent thereto and at a point where there were a few public buildings, the railroad company maintained a switch which could not be reached for loading and unloading purposes if it had been fenced, the court held it to be ground open to the public, and therefore not required to be fenced any more than the part of the track actually within village limits, which, being ground open to the public, was not required by statute to be fenced. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Chapin, 66 Ill. 504.

But where the freight or passenger traffic of a town is not large, and there are no elevators or warehouses indicating a place at which considerable quantities of produce are received and shipped, and there is a space 1,900 feet in length from the depot within the town limits that could be used for the proper handling of trains and amply sufficient for the transaction of the business with the public, these facts justify a verdict that a point just beyond and outside the town limits cannot be considered depot grounds within the meaning of the exception to the fence laws. Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Franklin, 53 Ill. App. 632.

c. Way stations; flag stations; sidings.

The courts have found extreme difficulty in determining when a stopping place is of sufficient importance to be denominated a station, and to have the grounds immediately surrounding it unfenced. The following cases present the variety of opinion which this question has elicited:

A point where passengers are permitted to get on and off trains and freight is sometimes thrown off, but no agent is there to take charge of it, is not a station or depot; and the company is bound, at that point, to erect fences along either side of its track. Duncan v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 111 Mo. App. 193, 85 S. W. 661.

So, a point within pasture lands, where there is no station agent or depot, but there are a section house, stock yards, side tracks, and switch yards, and the shipping of cat-van v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 19 Or. 319, 24 Pac. 408.

The question for decision upon the trial, therefore, was whether the place where the animals of the plaintiffs entered upon the track of the defendant was within or without the depot grounds. If within the depot grounds, the plaintiffs cannot recover in this action, but if not, defendant is liable under the statute unless the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence. The parties differ radically as to whether the question thus presented is one of law or of fact. The plaintiffs claim that it was a question of fact, and should have been submitted to the jury, while the defendant insists that it was a matter of law for the court. The rule is, we take it, that whether a railway company shall fence its track at its depot grounds is a question of law, and, if the testimony shows that animals entering upon such grounds are injured or killed by moving trains, the owner cannot recover under the statute, and the liability of the company is for the court. Moses v. Southern P. R. Co. supra; Eaton v. Oregon & R. Nav. Co. 19 Or. 371; 391. 24 Pac. 413, 415; Eaton v. McNeill, 31 Or. 128, 49 Pac. 875; Harvey v. Southern P. Co. supra. But it is often a disputed question as to whether a certain point constitutes a part of the depot grounds; and, if the evidence is conflicting, or different inferences may be drawn from it, the question is for the jury, and not the court. Mr. Elliott says: "While it is purely a question of law whether or not a railway company tile and other business are there transacted, and passengers are received, is not a station exempting the railroad company from fencing thereat. Southern Kansas R. Co. v. McKay (Tex. Civ. App.) 47 S. W. 479.

And a side track used only for loading and shipping tan bark, near where no depot or platform had been erected and no named station existed, was not depot grounds so that it need not be fenced. Jaeger v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 75 Wis. 130, 43 N. W. 732.

A point within a village recently platted, where there are none of the concomitants of a station except a platform and side track, is not depot grounds. Anderson v. Stewart, 76 Wis. 43, 44 N. W. 1091.

A railroad company is not relieved from the duty of fencing for a distance of 40 rods each way when a station consists merely of a platform, the public convenience not requiring the erection of a building, nor access to the station and tracks. Iowa C. R. Co. v. Gushee, 49 Ill. App. 609.

One thousand six hundred feet, of siding, used only for the passage of trains and for the wood and tie traffic, at a point where no freighting is carried on and where the passenger traffic is limited to persons flagging the accommodation trains, no station having been erected or agent kept there, cannot be regarded as depot grounds within the meaning of the fence laws. Hurt v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 39 Minn. 485, 40 N. W. 613.

But in the following cases entirely similar stopping places have been held to be stations, around which fences are not required:

Thus, it is not necessary to have a depot and a station agent at a railroad point to constitute the point a station within the fence laws. The receipt and discharge of passengers and freight, and maintenance of a platform, are sufficient. McGuire v. St. Louis, M. & S. E. R. Co. 113 Mo. App. 79, 87 S. W. 564.

So, a point where a railroad company has established a flag station and siding where passengers are taken on and put off, and where freight is received and delivered, and where the switching of trains is necessary for these purposes, is within the exception to the obligation to fence. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wallace, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 270, 21 S. W. 973.

And so, a point upon a main track where there are a water tank, telegraph office, ticket office, house for station men, and passenger platform, is depot grounds within the meaning of the statute. Peters v. Stewart, 72 Wis. 133, 39 N. W. 380.

So, a place where passengers get on and off trains, where goods are loaded and unloaded, where cars are set out upon the side tracks to be loaded and unloaded and stored and taken up again into trains, is a station which may lawfully have depot grounds of reasonable extent. Mills & L. C. Lumber Co. v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 94 Wis. 336, 68 N. W. 996.

A point upon the road at which trains stop daily, and passengers and freight are there taken and delivered, although no depot building has been built and no agent is kept there, is station grounds within the meaning of the fence laws. Schneekloth v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 108 Mich. 1, 65 N. W. 663.

In Indiana state railroad companies are not required to fence their tracks at sidings where freight or passengers are received or discharged. Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Quick, 109 Ind. 295, 9 N. E. 788, 925; Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Sawyer, 109 Ind. 342, 10 N. E. 105; Becholdt v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 113 Ind. 343, 15 N. E. 686.

Where the evidence shows that very slight business is carried on at a station which is not of enough importance to build an office or station house, it is not necessary to leave a full half mile of track unfenced for the transaction of business. Acord v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 113 Mo. App. 84, 87 S. W. 537.

It was held in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Dumser, 109 Ill. 402, that, when the legislature in absolute terms limits the exceptions to the statutory requirement that tracks must be fenced to that portion thereof within cities and villages, the exception will not apply to a station with its switches and side tracks maintained by the company shall fence at its depot grounds or at points where the erection of a fence would interfere with the company in transacting its business, it is a question of fact whether a certain point constitutes part of the depot grounds, or whether the erection of a fence at any particular place would interfere with the company's employees in the performance of their duties." 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 1202. In Grosse v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 91 Wis. 482, 65 N. W. 185, the unfenced portion of the right of way was half a mile in length and extended north beyond a switch which was 1,400 feet from the depot building. At a highway crossing a short distance south of the switch it was customary to load and unload freight. Between such crossing and the switch, plaintiff's colts for the reception and discharge of passengers and freight at a point not within the limits of a city or village. The animal in this instance was killed 80 rods east of the station, but between the station and the end of a switch used in connection with it. This decision is later explained and practically overruled in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Hans, 111 Ill. 114, where, in reaching a directly contrary conclusion to the one above stated, the court says that it was not necessary in the Dumser Case to decide that the company was derelict in duty in failing to fence its track at the depot, since the animal got upon its track and was killed at a point some distance therefrom, and that, for that reason, the judgment in favor of the plaintiff was properly affirmed; thus implying that the company was unquestionably under an obligation to fence at the point in question between the station and the end of a switch connected with it. After thus explaining the Dumser Case, the court proceeds, and decides that the statute must be held to include in its exceptions to points required to be fenced, also, stations not within the limits of cities or villages; that the statute, by its terms, relates to the road or track of the railroad; that the main feature at a station is not the road or track; and that it is the duty of the company at all times to provide ready and convenient means of access to its stations and depots; and that to require them to be fenced would be to cause delay and inconvenience to the public.

d. Switch limits.

1. In general.

As a general rule depot grounds are held to extend at least to the switch and side-track limits.

"Switch limits," and "station grounds" seem to be used as meaning the same thing in: Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Cooper, 32 Tex. 592, 75 S. W. 328.

Depot grounds, within the meaning of the fence laws, include the terminals and switch came upon the right of way and were killed, and it was held that it was a question for the jury whether the place of entry was a part of the depot grounds. In Rhines v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 75 Iowa, 597, 39 N. W. 912, it was held that whether that part of the company's ground which was not the ordinary place of receiving or delivering freight, but where freight of a single shipper was handled, should be left unfenced, was a question of fact for the jury. And in Dinwoodie v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 70 Wis. 160, 35 N. W. 296, it was likewise held to be a question of fact whether the defendant's right of way at a point 60 rods from the station building where there was a side track in addition to the main track was necessary and convenient and actually used stands of all switches or side tracks at all depots and stations. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Blankenbeckler, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 249, 35 S. W. 331.

A point within switch limits was held to be within depot grounds, in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ogg, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 285, 28 S. W. 347.

The space used for switches and side tracks is not required to be fenced. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Boozer, 2 Posey, Unrep. Cas. (Tex.) 454, arguendo.

A point between the station building and west switch was deemed, without question, within depot grounds, in Eaton v. McNeill, 31 Or. 123, 49 Pac. 875.

In Downey v. Mississippi River & B. T. R. Co. 94 Mo. App. 137, 67 S. W. 945, it is said that, if a town is unincorporated, a railroad company must fence its tracks therein, except where it needs to keep them open within reasonable switch limits for the convenient transaction of business.

A fence is not necessary within what may be called depot grounds, i. e., such portion as is necessary for the switches and other purposes connected with the depot; beyond such limits it is necessary. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Finney, 42 Ill. App. 390.

The fence law does not apply to depot grounds. In this instance depot grounds were stated to cover 5 or 6 acres, extending along on either side of the road, and used for loading and unloading freight, and including switches and side tracks. Davis v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 26 Iowa, 549.

Where a railroad maintained a depot, stock pens, and a side track, and there were also a sawmill and flouring mill in the immediate vicinity of the side track, it was held not incumbent upon the company to construct fences upon either side at any point occupied by the side track. Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Leak, 89 Ind. 596.

The east side of a track upon which there were a depot, sawmill, and other sidings, and a long switch, was held properly unfenced the extent of the switch, in Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Candle, 60 Ind. 112.

A point 40 yards within a depot and with-for loading and unloading freight, so as to make it a part of the depot grounds, thus relieving the company from the duty of fencing it. And in Bean v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 20 Mo. App. 641, it was ruled that, where a cow was killed adjacent to a railroad station and at a place used by the railroad for switching purposes in connection with its station grounds, the court could not declare, as a matter of law, that the company was not bound to fence its track at that point. See also Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Hale, 93 Ind. 79; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Modesitt, 124 Ind. 212, 24 N. E. 986; McDonough v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 73 Wis. 223, 40 N. W. 806. The depot or station grounds of a railway company is the place where passengers get on and off the trains and where freight is loaded and unloaded, and includes all grounds reasonably necessary or convenient for that purpose, together with the necessary tracks, switches, and turnouts thereon or adjacent thereto for handling and making up trains, storage of cars, and the like, and so much of the main track outside the switches as is requisite for the proper handling of trains at the station. 3 Words & Phrases Judicially Defined, 2005 et seq.; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 307; Grosse v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra; Grondin v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 100 Mich. 598, 59 N. W. 229. And where grounds have been appropriated, surveyed, and set apart by the railway company for station or depot purposes, it affords very strong, if not conclusive, evidence that their boundaries and extent are such as and no more than are necessary and proper, and in switch limits, where it would be inconvenient to the public to fence the track, is within depot grounds. Swanson v. Melton, 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 264, 17 S. W. 1088.

A spur track at a flag station used by the public need not be fenced. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Willis, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 228, 42 S. W. 371.

The finding of the court that the space where the animals came upon the railroad track was within the switch limits, and substantially that such switch limits were requisite for the business of the company and of the public and for the safety of employees, is conclusive on the question of the reasonableness of the length thereof. Redmond v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 104 Mo. App. 651, 77 S. W. 768.

A railroad company is not required to fence along the line of its switch connected with its station, when all the switch is substantially used by the public in its transaction of business with the railroad company. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Myers, 43 Ill. App. 251.

But the switch limits must not extend over a greater space than is reasonably necessary for the convenient transaction of the railroad company's business with the public, in order to come within the term "depot grounds," within the meaning of the fence laws.

It would be an improper construction of the statute to hold that station grounds extend as far as switching grounds, when the latter extend a long distance, apparently designed eventually to become a part of a double-track system. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Seveck (Neb.) 110 N. W. 639.

So, where a switch connected with the depot extends along the main track for a considerable distance through an open prairie, it is just as necessary and practicable to have the road fenced as upon any other part of the road. Morris v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 68 Mo. 78.

A point 2 miles from the depot is not within the depot grounds although within 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

or on the edge of the yard limits of a railroad company. Nickolson v. Northern P. R. Co. 80 Minn. 508, 83 N. W. 454.

Where switches begin 200 yards from a small station and then extend a quarter of a mile through uninclosed lands, the space occupied by them cannot be considered depot grounds, since it is manifest that they cannot be necessary for the transaction of business between the railroad company and the public. Russell v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 26 Mo. App. 368.

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Billingsly (Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 27, it is said that switch limits are not necessarily places which public necessity and convenience require should be left open and unfenced. They may be so and they may not be. They may extend far beyond the limits of public necessity. In such cases the right of way must be fenced to relieve the company of damages for killing stock in such limits.

Where, at the point at which a horse went upon the track, there is no station, the nearest building is 175 feet north, the nearest crossing is 175 feet south, and a yard track lies 60 feet each way, the adjoining ground being unoccupied for any purpose, the situation is not such that a fence could not have been maintained without interfering with the company's business transactions with the public or the safety of its employees. And the fact that the point under consideration was within the switch limits of the road does not change the situation. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Peters, 1 Ind. App. 69, 27 N. E. 299.

The fact that there was a switch at a particular place does not raise the presumption that it was part of the station ground. The railroad company can always establish by proof what grounds are used for station purposes. Comstock v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. 32 Iowa, 376.

It is said in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Hans, 111 Ill. 114, that such parts of side tracks as do not constitute part of the depot their limits should not be curtailed or extended by the court or jury unless in a very clear case. 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 1194; Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Campbell, 47 Mich. 265, 11 N. W. 152; McGrath v. Detroit, M. & M. R. Co. 57 Mich. 555, 24 N. W. 854; Rabidon v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 115 Mich. 390, 39 L.R.A. 405, 73 N. W. 386.

Now, there was no evidence in this case that the place where the plaintiff's horses entered upon defendant's track was within the limits of the station grounds, as set aside and designated by the defendant, or within such grounds, as hereinbefore defined; and therefore the court could not declare, as a matter of law, that defendant was not required to fence its track at such point. The north track constructed by the defendant in 1902, so far as the evidence shows, was intended to be used for the passing of trains, and was in no way connected with or necessary to the use of the depot grounds; nor, indeed, that it was on such grounds. We think, therefore, that the question whether the point where the horses entered was within the depot grounds was a question for the jury, and should have been submitted to them. A claim is made that plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence in turning their horses out to graze upon the uninclosed lands near the depot; but whether this was such contributory negligence, under the circumstances, as will defeat a recovery, was for the jury. Moses v. Southern P. R. Co. supra; 2 Thomp. Neg. § 2004.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

yard may well be held to be within the statute.

2 Points between switch ends and depot building.

At points within the switch limits of a station where the company and public use the track for receiving and discharging freight, there is no duty on the railroad company to fence. To require such places to be fenced would cause delay and inconvenience to the public, and detract from the public character of a railroad. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Roper, 47 Ill. App. 320.

Where a cow was killed by going upon the track within the limits of a side track and station grounds, the side track being used by the public and company in loading and unloading freight, every day or two, the year round, it was held that no recovery based upon the ground of a failure to fence could be had, since it was necessary that those parts of the track be kept open for the convenience of the public. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Abney, 43 Ill. App. 92.

Where evidence shows that the public convenience requires access to a switch at a point between the end of the switch and a station house, that point is within the station grounds, so as to be within the exception to the fence laws. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Umphenour, 63 Ill. App. 642; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Grissom, 60 Ill. App. 114.

A point within switch limits and in the vicinity of a depot was regarded as within depot grounds, in Swearingen v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 64 Mo. 73, because necessary for the transaction of business between the railroad company and the public.

A railroad company was held not liable for stock killed on account of a failure to fence from the ends of a switch to the station house, the point at which the stock entered upon the track being between one end of a switch and the station house, the station being situated in an unincorporated village. Louisville, E. & St. L. Consol. R. Co. v. Scott, 34 Ill. App. 636.

But the court, in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Hans, supra, seems to be of the opinion that a point 80 rods east of the station, but between the station and the end of a switch used in connection with it, was one where the railroad company was unquestionably under an obligation to fence.

3. Points beyond switch ends.

Perhaps the point of this question upon which the greatest difference of opinion exists is whether, or how far, depot grounds may extend beyond switch limits. Some of the courts squarely take the stand that they cannot to any extent.

Thus, the end of a side track is as far as depot grounds can extend for any possible public purpose. Between there and the highway is outside. Plunkett v. Minneapolis, S. Ste. M. & A. R. Co. 79 Wis. 222, 48 N. W. 519.

So, a point beyond switch limits and a quarter of a mile from the depot is one where the railroad company must fence. Lepp v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 87 Mo. 139.

A point 65 feet north of the head block and last switch in that direction, below which are the roundhouse and terminal grounds occupied by shops, etc., is not part of the depot grounds within the meaning of the fence laws. Cox v. Minneapolis, S. Ste. M. & A. R. Co. 41 Minn. 101, 42 N. W. 924.

In Peyton v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 70 Iowa, 522, 30 N. W. 877, the stock in question was struck and killed by a train at a point on its main line of road about 140 feet beyond the end of side tracks, still further beyond which cattle guards had been placed. It was claimed that the point was within depot grounds because it was necessary to use the main line between the cattle guard and switches for the purpose of stopping trains and uncoupling cars to throw them into the switches, and that, since fences or cattle guards at this point would endanger the lives of employees, it must be considered within the depot grounds. In refusing to support this contention, the court uses conspicuously clear language, saying: "The uniform holding has been that the company has no right to fence its track at such places as the public have the right to come upon the right of way to transact business with the company, as a carrier of freight or passengers,—such as at side tracks set apart and used for receiving and discharging freight. This would not include parts of the track not used for the purpose of the transaction of business between the company and the public. It would not include that part of the road where there are side tracks used for the convenience of the company, and not at stations. The damage was not done in this case at a point on the line where the public had any business with the road. The animals were killed outside of the switches and outside of the depot grounds. It may be true, as the defendant claims, that at that point it was necessary for the trainmen to use the track for the purpose of entering the switches, and that a fence and cattle guards across the track at the end of the side tracks would be an inconvenience, and possibly an increase of the hazard of coupling and uncoupling cars. But it is very plain that the right to fence existed, notwithstanding these facts. The theory of exemption from the statute requiring fences has always been founded upon the relation of the company to the public, and not to any other consideration. In the case at bar the depot grounds were plainly within the switches."

A verdict that a point between the end of a side track and cattle guard, the side track being connected with a partly abandoned station, was not within depot grounds, was sustained in McDonough v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 73 Wis. 223, 40 N. W. 806.

In some instances, while holding to the doctrine that the switch limits are the extent of the depot grounds, the courts recognize the element of necessity of public access as one which would change the rule.

Thus, a point 37½ feet outside of switch limits and 13 feet outside of town limits, shown to have been nonessential to the accommodation of the public, was held not within depot grounds, in Chouteau v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 28 Mo. App. 556.

And a point upon a main track several hundred feet beyond a switch cannot be considered part of the depot grounds when there is no practical objection to its being fenced. Blair v. Milwaukee & P. du Ch. R. Co. 20 Wis. 254.

But, opposed to this class of cases above shown is another, which holds the public necessity of access not the only reason for exemption from the obligation to fence, but which regards the safety to employees and convenience of the railroad company in train operations as equally weighty reasons for making an exception to the statute.

Thus, in Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Willis, 93 Ind. 507, it is said it is well settled that a railroad company is not required to fence its road where such fence interferes with its own rights in operating its road or transacting its business, nor where the rights of the public in traveling or doing business with the company are interfered with; so a company need not fence between the end of a switch extending beyond the station house and a bridge crossing a highway, when the necessary cattle guards would, on account of the peculiar circumstances involved, endanger the lives of employees.

So, station grounds cannot be limited to the territory within the switches. At least as much of the track and grounds outside of the switches as is required and is in actual use for reaching the side tracks is a part of the station grounds to which the statutory requirement to fence does not apply. Grondin v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 100 Mich. 598, 59 N. W. 229.

When a cattle guard could not be placed any nearer the head of a switch without endangering the lives of employees the company is not liable, as the switching is necessary to the transactions of the station or business with the public. Pearson v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. 33 Mo. App. 543.

There is no duty on the part of the railroad company to fence between a cattle guard and the end of a switch connected with a station, when by so doing the transaction of business would be hindered and the lives of employees endangered. Jennings v. St. Joseph & St. L. R. Co. 37 Mo. App. 651.

A railroad company is exempt from fencing between a cattle guard and the apex of a switch connected with a station, when its business would be thereby materially interfered with and the safety of employees endangered. Grant v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 56 Mo. App. 65.

So, a railroad company is exempt from fencing at a point 95 feet distant from the apex of a switch, when the evidence tends to show that the switch limits are reasonable and cannot be contracted without materially interfering with handling of trains at the station. Webster v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 57 Mo. App. 451.

A railroad company is not required to maintain cattle guards so near to the approach of its switches connected with the station as to interfere with the business of handling its trains. Hurd v. Chappell, 91 Mo. App. 317.

Evidence that an ordinary train must run to a bridge in order to switch back onto a side track, conceded to be on depot grounds, inclined the court to the opinion that the weight of evidence was in favor of that part of the railroad between the switch and the bridge being a part of the depot grounds; but it nevertheless refused to set aside a verdict to the contrary. Fowler v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 21 Wis. 77.

Prima facie, depot grounds include all that part of the right of way which is left unfenced between the switches and cattle guards on either side of the platform, including the switches and side tracks. In some instances they may even be deemed to extend beyond the switch to that point to which an ordinary freight train must run in order to switch and run back upon its side track. Mills & L. C. Lumber Co. v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 94 Wis. 336, 68 N. W. 996.

e. Private shipping points.

Consistently with the principle controlling this question, it has been held that a private shipping point must be fenced. The public convenience or necessity is not, in such a case, involved, and one individual's convenience is not paramount to the right of protection of any other individual.

Thus, where, at the point where an animal was killed, there were a private rolling mill and four or five tracks, one being the main track and the others being used for the accommodation of the rolling company, sometimes for others, and sometimes for switching; but there was no depot near,—the point in question could not be regarded as depot grounds, exempting the company from fencing it. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Hays, 29 Kan. 193.

So, a point where a switch is maintained for the exclusive accommodation of a mill, although trains sometimes stop there as a matter of special accommodation to receive or discharge passengers or freight, is not a station, so as to exempt the railroad company from fencing at that point. Foster v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 112 Mo. App. 67, 87 S. W. 57.

III. Extent of depot grounds a question for the jury.

a. In general.

It is the almost unanimous conclusion of the courts that the question of the proper extent of the depot grounds is one of fact, to be determined by the jury. Wabash R. Co. v. Howard, 57 Ill. App. 66; Cole v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 311; Crenshaw v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 54 Mo. App. 233; McDonough v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 73 Wis. 223, 40 N. W. 806; Acord v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 113 Mo. App. 84, 87 S. W. 537.

It is for the jury, or the court sitting as a jury, to say throughout what distance it is necessary to leave tracks unfenced. Downey v. Mississippi River & B. T. R. Co. 94 Mo. App. 137, 67 S. W. 945.

The space needed for depot purposes depends upon the facts in each particular case. Schafer v. St. Louis & H. R. Co. 65 Mo. App. 201.

It is not competent to take the opinion of witnesses on the subject, but it is for the jury to say, whether or not a railroad should be fenced at a certain point. Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Hale, 93 Ind. 79.

The extent of switch limits connected with a station is a question for the jury. Glasscock v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 82 Mo. App. 146; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Billingsly (Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 27.

It is for the jury to say whether cattle guards have been constructed at the first point near a station which would not interfere with the necessities of the public, the employees, and the company. Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Newbrander, 40 Ohio St. 15.

Whether a point a few rods from a depot building is within the limits of depot grounds is a question for the jury. Habenicht v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 126 Wis. 521, 105 N. W. 910.

It is a question for the jury whether points within switch limits where stock was killed were within station grounds. Rosenberg v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (Neb.) 110 N. W. 641.

Whether it was necessary that intervening ground between a station and a street 900 feet west thereof should not be inclosed with a fence, in order that the public could have ready and convenient means of access to the station, is a question of fact for the jury. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Green, 65 Ill. App. 414.

It is for the jury to determine from the evidence whether the public use and convenience require that a portion of the track on the opposite side of the highway from the station, and beyond a warehouse and other buildings alongside the track, be left unfenced. Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Thompson, 48 Ill. App. 36.

Whether the existence of a switch on the opposite side of a crossing from a depot, which switch is used by the public for loading and unloading merchandise from the cars, excuses the company from the obligation to fence at that point, is a question for the jury. Wabash R. Co. v. Warren, 113 Ill. App. 172.

It is a question for the jury whether an animal killed by a train came upon the track upon such part of station grounds as are required to be open for the convenience of the public in the use of the railroad. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Grissom, 60 Ill. App. 114.

Whether an animal entered upon a track where a station and grounds in connection therewith were maintained for the transaction of business with the public and the receipt and discharge of freight or passengers, and where it was necessary to keep the grounds open and unfenced for the use of the public, and where the placing of cattle guards would have endangered the safety of employees was an issue of fact for the jury. Prather v. Kansas City & N. Connecting R. Co. 84 Mo. App. 86.

It is a question of fact, to be ascertained from all the evidence, whether a given point is not only within claimed station grounds, but also whether the point was necessary for the company's use in conveniently and safely transacting its business, and for the accommodation of the public transacting business at the station. Johnson v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. 27 Mo. App. 379.

It is a proper question for the jury whether a point upon the main track was within the depot grounds, which was 60 rods from the station, paralleled by a spur track, alongside of which was a ditch which prevented its use for loading and unloading cars, although towards the end, where the ground was level, it had been used occasionally for loading ties. Dinwoodie v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 70 Wis. 160, 35 N. W. 296.

And it is a question for the jury whether a point about 300 feet south of a depot, and 240 feet south of the end of a switch, in a small village where traffic is light, is necessarily left unfenced for the safe and convenient transaction of business. Brandenburg v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 44 Mo. App. 224.

And so, it is a question for the jury whether the distance between a cattle guard and the end of a switch 1,400 feet from the depot building and from the end of the switch to the depot, a distance in all of half a mile, is all depot grounds, and especially a point at a highway crossing a short distance from the end of the switch, between there and the depot. Grosse v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 91 Wis. 482, 65 N. W. 185.

It is a question of fact for the jury whether a point in question is reasonably required as a part of depot grounds, when the situation is as follows: The distance from a west switch to an east switch extending along past the depot, warehouses, etc., was 1,800 feet, and space to the extent of 200 feet at one end and 350 feet at the other, beyond the switch, was also left unfenced and claimed as a part of the depot grounds. Stock was killed at a point 160 feet beyond one of the switches, and the question was whether that point was within the depot grounds. Snell v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. St. M. R. Co. 87 Minn. 253, 91 N. W. 1108.

Whether the public convenience and interest of the road require that a point on the track in defendant's yard, not used by the public at large, but for the greater convenience of a single shipper, be left unfenced, is a question for the jury. Rhines v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 75 Iowa, 597, 39 N. W. 912.

It is obvious that WILMOT v. OREGON R. & NAV. Co. has the support of many decisions to the conclusion reached therein on this point.

But, where the evidence conclusively shows that a point is within the depot grounds of a railroad company, and could not be fenced without great inconvenience to the public, the court errs in not peremptorily so instructing the jury. Hillman v. Grays Point Terminal R. Co. 99 Mo. App. 271, 73 S. W. 220.

The jury failed to agree as to whether a point within a quarter of a mile of a depot was upon the depot grounds. A motion for a new trial was made on the ground that the court should have required a finding 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

from them in that regard. In overruling the motion, the court itself determined that the point in question, which is not further described, was not on depot grounds. Monaahan v. Keokuk & D. M. R. Co. 45 Iowa, 523.

A railroad company is not expected to fence such switch grounds as are necessary to remain open for the use of the public and the necessary transaction of business. The space to be kept open should be no more than is reasonably necessary, and what is necessary is a question the courts may determine. Vanderworker v. Missouri P. R. Co. 51 Mo. App. 166.

In one instance, speaking somewhat generally, however, the court says that whether a company is or is not obliged to fence its road at a given point is a question of law, and not of fact. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Peters, 1 Ind. App. 69, 27 N. E. 299.

b. Effect of allotment as depot grounds.

The definite allotment by a railroad company of land around a station as station grounds has considerable weight in settling the question as to their extent. If the allotment is reasonable, considering the present needs of the company and public in the transaction of business, or, to some extent, the future needs of the road may be taken into consideration, an allotment is practically conclusive of the question but the courts are unanimous in reserving to themselves the ultimate determination, as a question of fact, whether or not an allotment is reasonable under all the circumstances, and, in case it is not, to determine what would be the proper limits.

Thus, it is a question of fact, to be determined by the jury from all the evidence, not only whether the point where animals strayed upon a track was within the claimed station grounds and switch limits, but also whether the point was necessary for the company's use in conveniently and safely transacting its business. The railroad company cannot arbitrarily determine the question, but it is subject to review by the courts, whose duty it is to submit the question to the jury. Straub v. Eddy, 47 Mo. App. 189.

The railway company is not the judge of what space is necessary for the transaction of its business with the public. Such questions are determined upon the evidence. Pearson v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. 33 Mo. App. 543.

Admitting that land necessarily used for station grounds need not be fenced, this does not exempt the railroad company from fencing land not necessary, but claimed as a part of its station grounds. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shaft, 33 Kan. 531, 6 Pac. 908.

A railroad company, by fencing each side of its main track from a certain point, fixes that point as the limits of its station grounds. Stewart v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. (Mich.) 110 N. W. 126.

Where a railroad company has its depot or station grounds surveyed and platted, or distinctly and definitely allotted, such survey or allotment and use would constitute a very strong, if not conclusive, proof of their necessary boundaries. The question of use is for the jury. Cole v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 311.

It is well settled that railroads are not arbitrarily to determine for themselves the question of the necessity of the space they claim for station grounds and switches. Acord v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 113 Mo. App. 84, 87 S. W. 537.

"No doubt the question of what, or how much, ground, at any particular station, will be necessary for the convenience of business at that station, must, in the first instance, be determined by the company itself. But that determination cannot, considering the nature of the interests involved, in all cases be conclusive. . . . So it seems that cases may arise in which it may properly be a question for the jury whether the place where the animals were injured was within the limits of grounds which were reasonably necessary for depot uses, although they were actually used by the company for that purpose." Grosse v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 91 Wis. 482, 65 N. W. 185.

How much or how little land a railroad company purchases for depot grounds is immaterial; the jury must find whether the point in question was so used. Fowler v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 21 Wis. 77.

A railroad cannot arbitrarily determine for itself the question whether a space uninclosed, claimed for station use, depot purposes, and switch limits, was necessary for the convenient and safe transaction of its business and for the accommodation of the public; but, where evidence has been introduced tending to show that the railroad company might have fenced its road where animals strayed thereon, without causing inconvenience to the railway, or to those having business to transact with it, or to the public at such point, the jury should determine the question of the necessity of the land uninclosed for such uses. Hillman v. Grays Point Terminal R. Co. 99 Mo. App. 271, 73 S. W. 220, arguendo.

"The territory required for this purpose [station grounds], when ascertained and set apart, constitutes what is called depot and station grounds, and varies in amount, usually, according to the location and amount of business to be done, and the necessities and convenience of the company and public in doing their business at the station. These grounds, as we have seen, are not required to be fenced by the company, and, of course, cannot be made to extend from station to station. They are usually quite limited in extent, and are intended to furnish sufficient space for construction of side tracks, offices, passenger depots, freight houses, and other buildings, ways, and yards suitable and convenient for the speedy and safe reception and discharge of passengers and freight, and the storage of cars and other property belonging to the company and persons doing business with the road. The existence of extent of these grounds is not to be determined by the continued actual use of any part thereof. When station grounds are laid out, their contemplated future use is not unfrequently of more consideration than the actual demands at the time in determining their shape and extent." McGrath v. Detroit, M. & M. R. Co. 57 Mich. 555, 24 N. W. 854.

While the company, in the establishment of its stations and switch limits ought not to be restricted to the present, immediate use of all the space allotted in its plans, but should be allowed to take into consideration the prospective increase in business at such station, yet such calculation should be a reasonable one, and there should be some evidence in regard to it. Johnson v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. 27 Mo. App. 379.

It is not enough that the plans of the company contemplated, at some indefinite time in the future, the use of grounds claimed as depot grounds for increased business. The question is whether it is actually, reasonably so used at the time in question. Cox v. Minneapolis, S. Ste. M. & A. R. Co. 41 Minn. 101, 42 N. W. 924.

The criterion is not whether all the grounds set apart for depot and station purposes have been actually used, but whether, in view of the present or prospective needs of such grounds for station or depot purposes, the company has used a reasonable discretion in throwing them open for that purpose. Rinear v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 70 Mich. 620, 38 N. W. 599.

But, when grounds are appropriated and set apart by the company, their limits cannot be curtailed nor extended by a jury in a proceeding where they come collaterally in question, upon the mere showing that any part of the same were not in actual use at any particular time. McGrath v. Detroit, M. & M. R. Co. supra.

It will be seen, after a review of the above cases, that WILMOT v. OREGON R. & NAV. CO. places more weight upon an allotment by the railroad company of land as depot grounds than most of the prior decisions upon this point. It is still broad enough, however, to allow the courts to determine the extent of depot grounds in extreme cases of unreasonable allotment.

IV. Where burden of proof lies.

The burden of proving the necessity of leaving tracks unfenced at depot grounds is upon the railroad company. Crenshaw v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 54 Mo. App. 233; Wilder v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 70 Mich. 382, 38 N. W. 289; Croft v. Chicago Great Western R. Co. 72 Minn. 47, 74 N. W. 898; Nickolson v. Northern P. R. Co. 80 Minn. 508, 83 N. W. 454; Marengo v. Great Northern R. Co. 84 Minn. 397, 87 Am. St. Rep. 369, 87 N. W. 1117.

It rests with the railroad company to show that the place at which an animal entered upon a track within city limits was one which, under the law, it would not be permitted to fence, where the city embraces an area of 36 square miles, a large portion of which is not built up or platted. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Cocke, 64 Tex. 154.

The burden is upon the railroad company to show that it was relieved from fencing at a point on a main track from 90 to 180 feet south of the south end of a spur at a flag station. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Willis (Tex. Civ. App.) 52 S. W. 625.

In one instance, however, it was held that the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that a point was not upon depot grounds. Kyser v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 56 Iowa, 207, 9 N. W. 133. M. M. M.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

McCLAUGHRY et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

JOSEPH B. KING, Sheriff, etc.

(— C. C. A. —, 147 Fed. 463.)

Reward—acceptance.

A reward offered for the arrest of a criminal is not earned by the giving of information which leads to his arrest.

(June 23, 1906.)

Case Note.—Reward; what must be done in order to earn reward for arrest: — The questions as to necessity of knowledge of, and reliance upon, the offer of reward, as to who may earn the reward, time, and other conditions, are reserved for future treatment. This note is confined to the single question suggested by the title.

As said in McCLAUGHRY v. KING, it is generally held that a reward for an arrest is not earned by merely giving information which leads to the arrest. Burke v. Wells, F. & Co. 50 Cal. 218; Everman v. Hyman, 3 Ind. App. 459, 29 N. E. 1140; Lovejoy v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 53 Mo. App. 386; Sias v. Hallock, 14 Nev. 332; Re Walker, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 121; Kinn v. First Nat. Bank, 118 Wis. 537, 99 Am. St. Rep. 1012, 95 N. W. 969.

An arrest must be legal to entitle the one making it to a reward offered for the arrest. Marking v. Needy, 8 Bush, 22; Moore v. Peace (Ky.) 97 S. W. 762; Morris v. Kasling, 79 Tex. 141, 11 L.R.A. 398, 15 S. W. 226.

In Goldsborough v. Cradie, 28 Md. 477, it was held that a reward was not earned where the party for whose arrest it was offered was not absconding at the time of arrest.

And in State ex rel. Lindley v. Clark, 61 Mo. 263, it was held that a reward for the arrest of a fugitive was not earned if at the time of the arrest he was not a fugitive 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Ft. Smith Division of the Western District of Arkansas to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount of a reward alleged to have been earned by plaintiffs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Sanborn, Hook, and Adams, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Cravens & Cravens, A. C. Cunkle, and Arthur M. Jackson for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Cravens & Covington for defendant in error.

Adams, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition filed below shows that the defendant, who was sheriff of Johnson county, Arkansas, on the occasion of the robbery of a bank and murder of one Powers in that county, offered a reward of $2,750 "for the arrest of each of the parties convicted of such bank robbery and said murder;" that thereafter plaintiffs discovered that one West had been arrested by the police force of Evansville, Indiana, for vagrancy, and, being informed that he was suspected of being guilty of the Johnson county robbery and murder, and knowing that the reward of $2,750 had been offered for his arrest, from justice, but living openly and notoriously at his usual place of abode, without any concealment and accessible by the officers of the law at all times.

And in Monroe County v. Bell (Miss.) 18 So. 121, it was held that the statutory reward for the arrest of one fleeing, or attempting to flee, was not earned by arresting a person who, after killing another, remained at his home two days, and then went to another state and remained in one place until arrested, not concealing himself at either place, and his whereabouts being generally known.

In Montgomery County v. Robinson, 85 Ill. 174, it was held that one who, with a requisition, pursued a criminal into another state, and found him there confined in jail on another charge, but brought him back to the county where he committed the crime, earned the reward offered for his arrest.

In Hogg v. Com. 3 Ky. L. Rep. 470, it was held that the mere fact that the accused was persuaded to surrender, and not taken by physical force, did not deprive the person to whom the surrender was made of his right to the reward offered for the accused's arrest, there being no evidence of collusion or fraud.

But in Currie v. Swindall, 33 N. C. (11 Ired. L.) 361, it was held that, if the party for whose arrest the reward was offered surrendered himself of his own accord, with-notified defendant that West was under arrest in Evansville under an assumed name of Charles Johnson; that defendant, acting upon that information, immediately went to Evansville, apprehended West, and took him back to Johnson county, where he was subsequently tried, convicted, and executed for the crime of murdering Powers; that plaintiffs, at the request of defendant, furnished evidence which largely contributed to the conviction of West. A demurrer interposed to this petition on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action was sustained, and, plaintiffs declining to plead further, final judgment was rendered in favor of defendant.

Was the ruling on the demurrer right?

A reward offered for the arrest of an offender is an offer or conditional promise to pay the person performing the required service a certain sum of money. The performance of the service is the acceptance of the offer, or performance of the condition on which the promise is made, and, when done, concludes a binding contract. The matter rests exclusively in the domain of contract, involving an offer and its acceptance. One desiring to offer a reward may fix his own terms and conditions. If they are satisfactory they must, like other propositions, be accepted as made. If unsatisfactory no one out either force or persuasion, the claimant was not entitled to the reward.

An offer of a reward for the apprehension of any person who steals any "horse, mare, or gelding" is not earned by apprehending one who has stolen a mule. Com. v. Edwards, 10 Phila. 215; Com. v. Davidson, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 172.

In Vitty v. Eley, 51 App. Div. 44, 64 N. Y. Supp. 397, it was held that information leading to an arrest, extorted from the claimant through fear that he might be arrested himself for complicity, did not entitle him to the reward offered.

Part performance.

Where the entire reward is offered for an arrest coupled with some other condition, e. g., the recovery of stolen property, or conviction, or delivery of the culprit, no part of the reward is recoverable unless all the conditions have been performed. Van Horn v. Ricks Water Co. 115 Cal. 448, 47 Pac. 361; Hogan v. Stophlet, 179 Ill. 150, 44 L.R.A. 809, 53 N. E. 604; Partin v. Snider, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 616; Pool v. Boston, 5 Cush. 219; Jones v. Phenix Bank, 8 N. Y. 228.

Nor will a reward for the arrest of two persons be apportioned where only one has been arrested. Blain v. Pacific Exp. Co. 69 Tex. 74, 6 S. W. 679.

In Adair v. Cooper, 25 Tex. 548, it was held that parties who merely accompanied need accept them. The offer may be, and doubtless is, made according to the kind of service required. If the apprehension of a desperate character be required, it would naturally be made to persons who would brave the danger and assume the responsibility, either of making the arrest or causing it to be made. If, on the other hand, the apprehension of a different character is desired, personal bravery and responsibility might not be as much required as diplomacy, and the offer would naturally be addressed to one who would work up clues and give information.

From considerations like these, we well understand how an interested party may discriminate in the proposition he makes. It is obviously one thing to offer a reward for an arrest which involves danger and responsibility and quite a different thing to offer a reward for information which involves neither. The brave and strong of purpose only would naturally undertake the former, while the timorous and conservative might undertake the latter. One accepting the first offer would actually make the arrest, or cause it to be made, while one accepting the other offer might do the equally efficacious act, and the arrest might follow as a consequence, and he not be subjected to any personal danger or responsibility. The difference in the offer, as the sheriff to another county, where he received the prisoner from the custody of the sheriff of such other county, by whom the prisoner had been previously arrested, were not entitled to a reward offered for his arrest and delivery.

In Mosley v. Stone, 108 Ky. 492, 56 S. W. 965, it was held that where, in making the arrest, the claimant, in his necessary self-defense, so wounded the felon that he died before he could be delivered to the jailer, he was entitled to the reward offered for the felon's arrest and delivery.

An offered reward for an arrest and delivery to a designated jail is not earned by an arrest and delivery to a constable (Clanton v. Young, 11 Rich. L. 546); unless the constable subsequently delivers the arrested party to the designated jail (Williams v. Thweatt, 12 Rich. L. 478).

In Coffey v. Com. 18 Ky. L. Rep. 646, 37 S. W. 575, it was held that an offered reward for arrest and delivery was earned by an arrest before, and a delivery after, the offer.

Effect of assistance of officers.

In Stone v. Wickliffe, 106 Ky. 252, 50 S. W. 44, it was held that the one making the arrest, being entitled to the assistance of the arresting officers, and to have a posse comitatus summoned if necessary, need not make the arrest personally and alone in order to earn the reward.

well as the difference in the performance, clearly shows that the two make different contracts. This is recognized and affirmed in the case of Shuey v. United States, 92 U. S. 73, 23 L. ed. 697. The Secretary of War had offered one reward of $25,000 "for the apprehension of John H. Surratt," charged with being one of Booth's accomplices in the murder of President Lincoln, and at the same time announced that "liberal rewards will be paid for any information that shall conduce to the arrest" of Surratt. The trial court found that the claimant gave information that conduced to the arrest of Surratt, but that it did not constitute an "arrest" of him within the meaning of the offer. Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is found as a fact that the arrest was not made by the claimant, though the discovery and arrest were due entirely to the disclosures made by him. The plain meaning of this is that Surratt's apprehension was a consequence of the disclosures made. But the consequence of a man's act are not his acts. Between the consequence and the disclosure that leads to it there may be, and in this case there were, intermediate agencies. Other persons than the claimant made the arrest,—persons who were not his agents," etc.

But in Juniata County v. McDonald, 122 Pa. 115, 15 Atl. 696, the rule of the preceding case was held not to apply where the officer was bound by law to make the arrest at all hazards; that in such case he would be acting for himself rather than for the reward claimed.

In Swanton v. Ost, 74 Ill. App. 281, it was held that the person who found the one for whose arrest a reward was offered, and pointed him out to an officer, who made the formal arrest, was entitled to the reward. See also, in support of this rule, Crawshaw v. Roxbury, Haskell v. Davidson, and Ralls County v. Stephens, cited and set out in McCLAUGHEY v. KING.

Arrest by agent of claimant.

One need not make the arrest in person. Where he employs and pays, or agrees to pay, another to make the arrest as his agent or servant, he is entitled to the reward. Montgomery County v. Robinson, 85 Ill. 174; Pruitt v. Miller, 3 Ind. 16; Heather v. Thompson, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1554, 78 S. W. 194; Ralls County v. Stephens, 104 Mo. App. 115, 78 S. W. 291.

And where the reward is for an arrest and delivery the delivery may be made by an agent. Stephens v. Brooks, 2 Bush, 137.

Under Mississippi statute.

In Mississippi a statute provides that "any person who shall arrest anyone who

The following authorities are in harmony with the foregoing views, and sustain the contention that furnishing information merely which leads to an arrest is not the acceptance of an offer of a reward for making the arrest: Kinn v. First Nat. Bank, 118 Wis. 537, 99 Am. St. Rep. 1012, 95 N. W. 909; Juniata County v. McDonald, 122 Pa. 115, 15 Atl. 696; Everman v. Hyman, 3 Ind. App. 459, 29 N. E. 1140; Williams v. West Chicago Street R. Co. 191 Ill. 610, 85 Am. St. Rep. 278, 61 N. E. 456; Lovejoy v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 53 Mo. App. 386. The following authorities are relied on to sustain the contrary: Crawshaw v. Roxbury, 7 Gray, 374; Bease v. Dyer, 9 Allen, 151, 85 Am. Dec. 747; First Nat. Bank v. Hart, 55 Ill. 62; Haskell v. Davidson, 91 Me. 488, 42 L.R.A. 155, 64 Am. St. Rep. 254, 40 Atl. 330; Ralls County v. Stephens, 104 Mo. App. 115, 78 S. W. 291. These cases have been carefully examined and considered and the principle of decision will be briefly stated.

In the Crawshaw Case a reward was offered by the city of Roxbury "for the apprehension and conviction" of any person who shall set fire to any dwelling house. A fire was subsequently set by an incendiary Plaintiff, Crawshaw, was at the fire, sought out three police officers of the city, and rehas killed another and is fleeing, or attempting to flee, before arrest, and shall deliver him up for trial, shall be entitled to the sum of $100." Under this statute, it is held that when the person charged with the crime has been once in custody of the officers of the law, and is by them discharged or permitted to escape, the reward cannot be earned by one who subsequently makes a new arrest. Itawamba County v. Candler, 62 Miss. 194.

But if the arrest was for assault, and, after being discharged by the magistrate, the wounded man dies, and thereupon the slayer flees, the person arresting him for the murder is entitled to the reward. Newton County v. Doolittle, 72 Miss. 929, 18 So. 451.

When the arrest has been made by one citizen, and the prisoner, escaping from him, is arrested by another, who delivers him to the custody of the proper officer, such other is entitled to the reward. Wilson v. Wallace, 64 Miss. 13, 8 So. 128.

One earns the reward by arresting and delivering for trial the person who inflicted the mortal wound, although the wounded person does not die until after the arrest. Martin v. Copiah County, 71 Miss. 407, 15 So. 73.

One who arrests a fleeing murderer in another state, and notifies the proper sheriff in Mississippi, who goes and gets the accused, does not "deliver him up for trial." Gould v. Chickasaw County, 85 Miss. 123, 30 So. 710.

quested one of them to arrest one Clarke, whom he pointed out as the incendiary. Thereupon the officer was induced to and did arrest Clarke. The foregoing facts make it appear that Crawshaw made the officer his agent for making the arrest, and that in doing so the officer acted under the directions of Crawshaw. Some expressions are found in the charge of the court to the jury which obviously were made in the light of the facts just referred to and should be construed accordingly. Chief Justice Shaw, in announcing the opinion of the supreme court, disposes of the case on other grounds, and makes no reference, except to generally approve of the law as laid down in the charge, to the point now under consideration. In the Bease Case the doctrine of the Crawshaw Case is approved; emphasis being laid upon the fact that the incendiary was arrested by the officer at the request of Crawshaw. In the First Nat. Bank Case the reward was given to the plaintiff because his services were accepted and availed of by the persons offering the reward after he had informed them that he would claim the reward if he performed the services. The court held that, although the claimant was not embraced in the description of the persons to whom the reward was first offered, he was entitled to it by reason of the subsequent engagement made between the parties. In the Ralls County Case it distinctly appeared that the claimant directed an officer to arrest the suspected criminal, and the court there says that, although the officer was the first to lay hands on the suspect, "he did so as the agent, or, one may say, the arm of Stephens. He acted entirely for Stephens and by the latter's direction."

The foregoing cases practically announce the doctrine that, where a reward is offered for the arrest of a suspect, any person who either personally makes the arrest or induces another to act for him, as his agent, in so doing, is entitled to the reward. Concerning this doctrine there can be no difference of view. The only other case relied upon by counsel for plaintiffs is that of Haskell v. Davidson. That case contains expressions favorable to their view, but it is founded upon a state of facts which permit of a recovery on principles not out of harmony with those already stated. The defendant in that case had offered a reward "for the arrest and conviction of the person or persons who entered the room of Alexander Wilson and stole $35 therefrom." The plaintiffs were informed of this offer, and were thereby induced to enter upon an investigation of the crime. They discovered facts and circumstances strongly inculcating one Thompson, who was found and confronted with the charge by the plaintiffs, and thereupon made a full confession of his guilt to them and subsequently pleaded guilty to the indictment found against him by the grand jury. The arrest was but a matter of form, and was made by a deputy sheriff, who made no claim for the reward. It is in the light of such facts that the court says: "The service contemplated by a person making such an offer, and which the proposal should be construed as meaning, must be the obtaining and giving to some proper person interested sufficient information in relation to the perpetrator of the crime and his whereabouts as to authorize and secure the arrest of the offender, and subsequently to procure his conviction by a court of competent jurisdiction."

Disconnected with the peculiar facts of that case, we doubt that the learned court would have announced the principle quite as broadly as it did.

Applying well-recognized rules governing the interpretation of contracts, and the reasoning indulged, and authorities considered, we think the true rule is that, when an offer of a reward is made for an "arrest" of a suspect, it is not accepted by the giving of information merely, concerning the whereabouts of the suspect, but is accepted only when one assumes the personal danger and responsibility of either actually arresting the suspect or causing some other person to arrest him. The petition in this case fails to make such averments, and was, for that reason, fatally defective.

The judgment is affirmed.

Hook, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

The offer of a reward and its acceptance by the performance of the service is a contract, but it is not different from other contracts in respect to the rules of construction that should be applied. In such contracts, as in others, regard should not be had to the mere letter to the exclusion of the spirit. "The fruit and profit of a nut lie in the kernel, and not in the shell." It matters not that the proponent of the reward is entitled to make his own terms. When he has done so it is then for the court to say what they mean and whether they were substantially complied with, and in doing so it is not unjust to him to deprive him of a shrewd, narrow meaning of his own words.

The reward offered was for the arrest of each one of the parties guilty of a robbery and murder in Arkansas. A man named West was suspected. The plaintiffs discovered that under an assumed name he was under arrest in Evansville, Indiana, for vagrancy and street begging. His identity was unknown to the police of that city, and his identity and whereabouts were unknown to the Arkansas sheriff who offered the reward. Had not the plaintiffs acted he would have served his time at Evansville and disappeared. In this condition of affairs the plaintiffs, knowing of the reward and alone knowing of the identity and whereabouts of the accused, immediately notified the sheriff, who, acting thereon, at once went to Evansville, took him into custody, and removed him to Arkansas, where, with the assistance of plaintiffs, he was convicted and afterwards executed. It does not appear that anyone else than plaintiffs is claiming the reward. The Evansville police would not be entitled to it because what they did was in the mere performance of other duties and had no relation to the Arkansas crime or to the reward. The sheriff himself would not be entitled to it because his receiving possession from the police was a mere perfunctory service performed after the receipt of the important and necessary information from the plaintiffs. The man was already under arrest. He was where anyone who knew his identity could get him. It is not as if he had been at large. True, it may be said that he was not under arrest for the Arkansas crime until the sheriff arrived, but it seems to me to be quite a narrow construction to say that by simply laying a hand upon the accused and peacefully receiving him from the police the sheriff himself made the arrest and thereby escaped paying the reward he offered. Even if so narrow a meaning is to be given to the word "arrest," there is still reason for holding that when the sheriff went to Indiana he went for the plaintiffs and waived the personal performance of that unimportant service by them, since all that was vital and of consequence had already been done. The better rule is that he who is the active and efficient cause in securing the result described in an offer of reward is the one who is entitled to it. He is the one who accomplishes the result,—who brings it about. It is not the man who, when all else is done, and when the accused is, as it were, tied to a stake, merely performs the letter of the final act without effort, skill, or enterprise. Such rule would conform to the spirit that actuated the offer of reward, and if it does it is the one that should prevail.

I think that the Massachusetts rule, expressed in Crawshaw v. Roxbury, 7 Gray, 374, and that of Maine shown in Haskell v. Davidson, 91 Me. 488, 42 L.R.A. 155, 64 Am. St. Rep. 254, 40 Atl. 330, is the reasonable one and is in harmony with those applied to contracts generally. In the Roxbury Case the reward was "for the apprehension and conviction of any person or persons who shall set fire to any dwelling house" etc. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Thereafter a building was set on fire by an incendiary and consumed. The plaintiff was at the fire and sought out three police officers and requested them to arrest one Clarke for having set the fire. He pointed Clarke out to one of the officers and stated facts and circumstances tending to show that Clarke committed the offense. Clarke was arrested by this officer upon the information given, and afterwards confessed to him. Another police officer made the complaint. Clarke pleaded not guilty at the trial, but was convicted upon the testimony of the officers. The plaintiff's information upon which he accused Clarke and requested his arrest was hearsay, and therefore he was not summoned to attend the trial. The city having refused to pay the reward, the plaintiff brought action therefor, and, having recovered a judgment, the city took the cause to the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, where it was affirmed. At the trial below the court instructed the jury as follows: "That the offer of a reward could not be taken literally, for, as the conviction must be in due course of law, requiring the intervention of the court and jury, a person might be entitled to the reward by becoming the prosecutor, and, as such, causing the arrest, and conducting the case to a conviction, or he might be entitled to it by giving information which should lead to and produce the arrest and conviction of the offender; that is, by giving such information to the city government of Roxbury, or to some officer authorized to act for them in making the arrest and prosecuting the offender to conviction upon the information so given; that in this case, the officers of the city having instituted and carried on the prosecution to conviction after the arrest, if the jury were satisfied that the facts disclosed by the plaintiff were such as induced the officer who arrested the offender to arrest him, and were material, and had a tendency to produce ultimate conviction, and without them Clarke would not have been convicted, unless upon his own subsequent conviction of guilt, the plaintiff would be entitled to the reward; and the fact that Clarke, subsequently to the disclosure of such information, made by the plaintiff, and upon which he was arrested, confessed his guilt, would not deprive the plaintiff of the right to recover, though Clarke's confession of guilt was produced in evidence upon his trial, and might have been the ground upon which he was convicted." Upon appeal, Chief Justice Shaw observed of this and other instructions: "The court are of opinion that the directions of the judge on the trial were correct in law, carefully guarded, and well adapted to the evidence before the jury."

In Haskell v. Davidson the reward offered was "for the arrest and conviction of the person or persons who entered the room of Alexander Wilson and stole $35 therefrom." The plaintiffs, being informed of the offer, commenced an investigation of the crime, with the result that facts and circumstances were discovered tending strongly to inculcate one Thompson, who, upon being found and confronted with the charge by the plaintiffs, made a confession of his guilt and subsequently pleaded guilty to an indictment found by the grand jury. The formal arrest of Thompson, however, was on a capias issued by the court, and was made by a deputy sheriff. The supreme judicial court of Maine sustained a recovery by the plaintiffs. It said: "An offer of reward is a proposal. The party making it may insert his own terms, and no person can become entitled to the reward without a performance of all the terms contained in the proposal. But such performance need not be a literal compliance with the terms of the offer. It is sufficient if the party claiming the reward has substantially performed the service required by the proposal. An offer of a reward for 'the arrest and conviction' of an offender cannot be taken literally. The person who, by reason of the offer, is induced to make an investigation, and finally obtains possession of sufficient facts to authorize the arrest of an offender, and his subsequent conviction, for the crime referred to in the offer, certainly cannot himself convict the offender. The service contemplated by a person making such an offer, and which the proposal should be construed as meaning, must be the obtaining, and giving to some proper person interested, sufficient information in relation to the perpetrator of the crime, and his whereabouts, as to authorize and secure the arrest of the offender, and subsequently to procure his conviction by a court of competent jurisdiction."

The case of Shuey v. United States, 92 U. S. 73, 23 L. ed. 697, is not in point, because it appeared from the face of the proclamation of reward by the Secretary of War that he made a clear distinction between the apprehension of Surratt on the one hand and information conducing to the arrest on the other. It was his privilege to do so. The sum of $25,000 was offered expressly for the apprehension, and it was specified in addition that "liberal rewards will be paid for any information that shall conduce to the arrest," etc. The claimant gave information, but other agencies effected the arrest. It is obvious that a man who asked and received a reward for information under such an offer should not also be rewarded for the apprehension of the fugitive by others. This 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) feature of the case was particularly adverted to by the Supreme Court. I think the plaintiffs here fairly earned the reward offered and should receive it.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

W. H. MITCHELL, Appt.,

v.

ROGER YOUNG.

(— Ark. —, 97 S. W. 454.)

Landlord and tenant—rights of sublessee.

1. A decree canceling a lease, made by consent of the lessee's administrator and representatives of the lessor, in proceedings to which the sublessee is not a party, will not affect his rights under the sublease.

Appeal—bill of exceptions—sufficiency.

2. A bill of exceptions which shows inferentially and by natural implication, from the language used, that it contains all the evidence, is sufficient.

Record—exception—nunc pro tunc entry.

3. The record may be made to show an exception to the overruling of a motion for new trial by nunc pro tunc entry.

(November 5, 1906.)

Case Note.—Effect of surrender of original lease on rights of sublessee: —The rule that a voluntary surrender of a lease will not affect the rights of a sublessee is fully supported by authority, and is based upon the reasoning that the sublessee acquires a valid term in, and a right to the possession of, the part of the demised premises let to him for the time agreed upon, subject to be defeated only by the expiration of the term of his lessor or a re-entry by the original lessor for some condition broken; and that this interest, having passed out of the original lessee, cannot be surrendered by him. Among the cases supporting the rule, are Baker v. Pratt, 15 Ill. 568; McKenzie v. Lexington, 4 Dana, 129; Trauerman v. Lippincott, 39 Mo. App. 478; McDonald v. May, 96 Mo. App. 236, 69 S. W. 1059; Eten v. Luyster, 60 N. Y. 252; Weiss v. Mendelson, 24 Misc. 692, 53 N. Y. Supp. 803; Oshinsky v. Greenberg, 39 Misc. 342, 79 N. Y. Supp. 853; Moskowitz v. Dirigen, 48 Misc. 543, 96 N. Y. Supp. 173; Hessel v. Johnson, 129 Pa. 173, 5 L.R.A. 851, 15 Am. St. Rep. 718, 18 Atl. 754; Cuschner v. Westlake (Wash.) 86 Pac. 948; Mellor v. Watkins, L. R. 9 Q. B. 400; Great Western R. Co. v. Smith, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 235.

So, also, it has been held, upon the same principle, that a surrender of the lease will not affect a mortgage of the leasehold estate (Allen v. Brown, 5 Lans. 280); nor the lien of a contractor for labor and materials (Gaskill v. Trainer, 3 Cal. 334); nor the rights of a purchaser of a building on the leased premises which the tenant had the APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pulaski County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to obtain possession of a room claimed by defendant under a lease. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James A. Comer, for appellant:

Appellant's rights were in no way affected by the cancellation.

Wood, Land & T. § 499; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 366.

Messrs. Bradshaw, Rhoton, & Helm for appellee.

Hill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, Young, as lessee of the Metropolitan hotel in the city of Little Rock, brought an action of unlawful detainer against Mitchell, the appellant, to obtain possession of a room in the lobby of said hotel occupied by Mitchell as a barber shop. On the trial before a jury the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff in said action, and Mitchell appealed.

The evidence develops these facts: The Metropolitan hotel was owned by one Young, and at his death passed to his heirs, and was probably controlled by the administrator. Torrey had a lease upon it, and during his lease he subleased the barber shop to Mitchell. This was in writing, and stipulated that, should Torrey get a renewal of his lease, it would carry a like renewal of Mitchell's lease of the barber shop. Torrey did obtain a renewal, and recognized Mitchell's renewed lease. Mitchell held for about two years under the renewed lease, and Torrey died in possession of the leased premises. Thereafter Torrey's administrator and the Young heirs and the administrator of Young consented to an order of probate court canceling the Torrey lease, which had still some time to run. After this agreed cancellation of the Torrey lease, the hotel was leased to Roger Young, the appellee, who had knowledge of Mitchell's occupancy of the barber shop and of his lease thereof under Torrey. Mitchell was not a party to the surrender of the Torrey lease, and was not notified of the proceedings in the probate court, and has not consented thereto.

Where there is no covenant against subletting, a lessee has a right to sublease all or any part of the leased premises, and when he does so he cannot, by a surrender of the leased premises to the lessor, defeat the rights of his undertenant. The interests of the undertenant will continue as if there had been no surrender, the owner of the property becoming the direct landlord of the undertenant. The lessee could only surrender what belonged to him, and, having sublet part of the property, it is not his to surrender. The owner takes back the premises subject to the existing rights growing out of the original lease. These principles are found stated and applied in the following right to remove at any time before the expiration of his term (Adams v. Goddard, 48 Me. 212).

A tenant from year to year, who has sublet part of the premises without any specification as to time, cannot affect the right of his subtenant to hold until the end of the year by surrendering to his lessor. Brown v. Butler, 4 Phila. 71.

Where the original owner enters upon a sublessee after the surrender of the original lease, he is guilty of trespass. Krider v. Ramsay, 79 N. C. 354; Brown v. Butler, supra.

The right of a subtenant to remove fixtures before or at the expiration of the term of the sublease cannot be affected by a surrender of the original lease. Morrison v. Sohn, 90 Mo. App. 76.

As a result of the foregoing rule, it has been held that where, after a surrender of the original lease, the owner of the premises demands and receives from the subtenant a greater rent than that stipulated in the sublease, the subtenant has no right of action against his immediate lessor for the amount so paid. Ritzler v. Raether, 10 Daly, 286.

The right of a subtenant to hold until the end of his term, notwithstanding a surrender of the original lease, is not affected by the fact that such original lease contained a covenant against subletting (Brown v. But- ler, supra); though it would be otherwise if the provision against subletting took the form of a condition, unless the forfeiture should be waived by the conduct of the original lessor (Trauerman v. Lippincott, 39 Mo. App. 478).

But a sublessee, who is notified of the surrender of the original lease, and is required to pay rent to the owner of the premises, and subsequently pays rent due previous to the surrender to the owner's agent, and applies to him for a new lease, must be held to have assented to the surrender and the right of the owner to re-enter, and his subsequent tenancy is one at the will of the landlord. Appleton v. Ames, 150 Mass. 34, 5 L.R.A. 206, 22 N. E. 69.

But where the original lease is canceled for breach of condition therein, a different question is presented. The original lessee not being able to confer upon the sublessee any greater rights than he himself possesses, the subtenant's rights are measured by those of the original tenant, and the cancellation of the lease by its own terms as to one cancels it as to both. Among the cases involving this question, see Bruder v. Geisler, 47 Misc. 370, 94 N. Y. Supp. 2; Shannon v. Grindstaff, 11 Wash. 536, 40 Pac. 123; Cuschner v. Westlake (Wash.) 86 Pac. 948.

authorities: Krider v. Ramsay, 79 N. C. 354; Bailey v. Richardson, 66 Cal. 416, 5 Pac. 910; Adams v. Goddard, 48 Me. 212; Eten v. Luyster, 60 N. Y. 252; Jones, Land & T. § 429.

It is urged that the bill of exceptions does not affirmatively show that it contains all of the evidence, but it does show inferentially and by natural implication from the language used that it contains all the evidence, and this is sufficient. Leggett v. Grimmett, 36 Ark. 496; Overman v. State, 49 Ark. 364, 5 S. W. 588.

It is said appellant did not except to overruling the motion for new trial, but that objection is removed by correction of the record by nunc pro tunc entry. It is sufficient if the record shows the exception. Carpenter v. Dressler, 76 Ark. 400, 89 S. W. 89.

Reversed and remanded.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

JENNIE M. TUTTLE, Appt.,
v.

IOWA STATE TRAVELING MEN'S ASSOCIATION.

(— Iowa, —, 104 N. W. 1131.)

Insurance—suicide—accidental means.

1. Death from suicide which springs from an insane impulse of a disordered or insane mind is through external, violent, and accidental means, within the meaning of an accident insurance policy.

Same—conflict of laws—place of contract.

2. Handing an application and fee to the agent of an insurance company in one state, to be forwarded to the insurer in another state, does not render the former state the place of contract, although the policy is returned to the applicant in that state by mail, where the by-laws of the insurer provide that the association shall not be liable in any manner until the directors have accepted the application and a certificate has been issued, since the contract is complete when the policy is placed in the mail, in the absence of anything requiring personal delivery.

Same—completion of contract.

3. No proposal for absolute indemnity is contained in an application for insurance which will render necessary an acceptance to make binding a policy providing for the levying of an assessment to meet the obligation, where the method of raising the fund is not alluded to in the application.

Same—benefit certificate—exceptions.

4. The enumeration in the application for insurance in a mutual benefit association of certain exceptions from liability does not, by exclusion, prevent the operation of an exception of suicide contained in the insurer's by-laws, so as to render acceptance necessary to make binding a policy containing such exception, where the application makes the by-laws a basis of membership in the association.

Case Note.—Death from suicide as one caused through external, violent, and accidental means:—The authorities seem to be practically unanimous in holding that death from suicide is caused by accidental means within the meaning of a policy insuring against bodily injuries from "external, violent, and accidental means," if the insured was, at the time of the act, so insane that he did not understand the nature of the act or that death would result therefrom. Thus, Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527, 30 L. ed. 740, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 685, holds that the act of the insured in hanging himself while insane is accidental within such a policy, as the expression "through external, accidental, and violent means" looks only to the "means" by which the injury is effected. In the court below, 27 Fed. 40, the court stated that the physical violence which terminated the life of the insured was the same as if it had come upon him from sources outside of himself and for which he was not responsible; and that although, in the darkness enveloping his mind, his own hand adjusted the fatal noose, the act was no more attributable to his voluntary agency than if, as a sane man, walking the street in the darkness of night, the same fatality, without co-operation on his part, or even consciousness of danger, had overtaken him.

Acci. Ins. Co. 74 Mich. 592, 3 L.R.A. 486, 42 N. W. 156, the court held that the death of the insured, caused by cutting his own throat while insane without knowing the result of his act and not intending thereby to kill himself, is an accidental death and an external injury, within the terms of a policy insuring against bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means. In this case the court says that, "where one is so far beside himself, his intellect so darkened and obscured, that he may be neither morally nor legally responsible for his own acts and conduct; and, in such condition, produces his own death,—it cannot be any more said to be his act than though the act had been committed by another, or the insured had placed himself upon some dangerous height and had fallen involuntarily and been dashed to pieces."

And in Grand Lodge I. O. M. A. v. Weitling, 168 Ill. 408, 61 Am. St. Rep. 123, 48 N. E. 59, the court states that there is a substantial concurrence of judicial decision in America on the proposition that if, at the time of the suicidal act, the assured was so affected with insanity as to be unconscious of the act, or of the physical effect thereof; or was driven to its commission by an insane impulse which he had not the power to resist,—the act of self destruction is regarded as though it were the result of accident, or some irresistible external force.

Same—waiver.

5. Waiver of the defense of suicide by an insurer is not effected by mailing blanks for proofs of loss with knowledge of the facts, under the express statement that they are for the convenience of the attorneys of the beneficiary, and with the distinct understanding that no rights are waived.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in defendant's favor in an action brought to enforce the amount alleged to be due on mutual benefit certificates. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John G. Park, E. H. McVey, and C. F. Mead, for appellant:

The suicide of an insane person is an accident.

Rep. 155; Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Broughton, 109 U. S. 121, 27 L. ed. 878, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 99.

The company cannot, by any contrivance or device whatever, evade the effect and operation of the laws of the state where it is doing business.

Berry v. Knights Templars' & M. Life Indemnity Co. 46 Fed. 439; Fletcher v. New York L. Ins. Co. 4 McCrary, 440, 13 Fed. 526; Coverdale v. Royal Arcanum, 193 Ill. 91, 61 N. E. 915; Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Thompson, 155 Ill. 204, 46 Am. St. Rep. 335, 40 N. E. 489.

Instruments sent by mail from one state to another, to take effect in the latter state, are governed by the law of the latter state.

Chatham Bank v. Allison, 15 Iowa, 357; Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 28 Am. Rep. 241; Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Simons, 52 Mo. App. 357; John A. Tolman Co. v. Reed, 115 Mich. 71, 72 N. W. 1104; Bell v. Bruen, 1 How. 169, 11 L. ed. 89; First Nat. Bank v. Mitchell, 34 C. C. A. 542, 92 Fed. 565.

Defendant was not authorized to accept by mail.

The insanity must, however, be such as to render the insured unconscious of the nature of the act, of its physical result, in order to be considered accidental. Thus, in Fidelity & C. Co. v. Weise, 182 Ill. 496, 55 N. E. 540, Reversing 80 Ill. App. 499, the court states that self-destruction cannot be classed as an accident, unless it appears that the person committing suicide was unconscious of the act, or of the physical effect thereof, or was driven to the commission of the deed by an insane impulse which he had not the power to resist.

And in Streeter v. Western Union Mut. Life & Acci. Soc. 65 Mich. 199, 8 Am. St. Rep. 882, 31 N. W. 170, the court holds that the suicide of the insured cannot be considered as a death by accident if the act was done for the purpose of self-destruction, and the insured was not unconscious at the time of inflicting the fatal wound, even though he was insane, and his insanity was produced by a fall several weeks before the act was committed.

The holding of TUTTLE v. IOWA STATE TRAVELING MEN'S ASSO., that the injury would not be considered to have been caused by accidental means if the insured was sane at the time of committing suicide, is supported by a statement in Fidelity & C. Co. v. Weise, supra, that, if the insured committed suicide while sane, his death would not be accidental within the meaning of such a policy.

And that death by suicide would not be considered accidental within the meaning of such a policy seems to be implied by the statement of the court in Merrett v. Preferred Masonic Mut. Acci. Assn. 98 Mich. 338, 57 N. W. 169, in which the circumstances attending the death of the insured were equally consistent with any one of several different means of death, including suicide; that, until there was some evidence tending to show that death resulted from accident rather than from design or natural causes, there was nothing to go to the jury.

But in Logan v. Fidelity & C. Co. 146 Mo. 114, 47 S. W. 948, the court seems to intimate that death by suicide would be considered accidental within such a policy by stating that, if one holds a general life policy and an accident policy, and is "killed by lightning, or commits suicide, so that he may be said to have died by accidental means," there should be a recovery on both policies; and that a stipulation against liability in case of suicide should be no more a defense against suit on the accident policy providing against death from accidental cause than in the case of suit on the general life policy. The question at issue in this case was whether an accident policy covering loss of life from external, violent, and accidental means was within the provision of Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 5855, prohibiting the defense of suicide in all suits on policies of insurance on "life," unless the insured contemplated suicide at the time of his application.

The means employed in committing suicide will have a determining effect on the question whether the death was caused by external and violent means. Thus, in the case of hanging, as in Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, supra, or of cutting one's throat, as in the case of Blackstone v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. supra, the death is clearly caused by such means. But in the case of suicide by taking poison, or by inhaling gas, the question would be different. While no decisions have been found as to whether death by poison taken with suicidal intent would be considered as caused by external or violent means, several decisions have been rendered on such point where the poison was taken by mistake and without any intent to destroy life; and the question as to whether the death was caused by such means would seem to be precisely the same in both cases. On this point, the authorities are divided. Thus, Dezell v. Fidelity & C. Co. 176 Mo. 253, 75 S. W. 1102, and Mutual Acci. Asso. v. Tuggle, 39 Ill. App. 509, Reversed on other grounds in 138 Ill. 428, 28 N. E. 1066, hold that death from an overdose of poisonous medicine is covered by such a policy.

O. U. W. v. Hutchinson, 6 Ind. App. 399, 33 N. E. 816;

And in Healey v. Mutual Acci. Asso. 133 Ill. 556, 9 L.R.A. 371, 23 Am. St. Rep. 637, 25 N. E. 52, Reversed 35 Ill. App. 17, and Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Dunlap, 59 Ill. App. 515, Affirmed in 160 Ill. 642, 52 Am. St. Rep. 355, 43 N. E. 765, the court rendered a similar decision where the poison was accidentally taken.

But in Bayless v. Travellers' Ins. Co. 14 Blatchf. 143, Fed. Cas. No. 1,139, the court held that a mistake in taking an overdose of opium which had been prescribed to induce sleep, resulting in death, was not covered by such a policy, as violence could not fairly be said to be an ingredient in the act of taking the medicine, although it was destructive in its action and death resulted.

And in Hill v. Hartford Acci. Ins. Co. 22 Hun. 187, the court held that, although death from poison taken by mistake without any intention to take poison was death through accidental means, it was not death from external and violent means.

In Richardson v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 46 Fed. 843, the policy insured against death resulting alone from external, violent, and accidental means, and expressly excepted from its provision death by inhaling gas. The court states that there was no visible sign of violence or external injury on the body of the insured, and that when found he was lying on his side in bed as if asleep, with no distortion of limb or features, or other evidence of violence, pain, or suffering. The court held that the company was not liable, under the clause excepting death from inhaling gas, and also because it was uncertain from the evidence whether the death was the result of accident, or whether it was occasioned by suicidal act and intent. No decision was actually made as to whether death was caused by external and violent means, although there seems to be a clear intimation that it was not due to violence.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Atrophy of the optic nerve had all but destroyed the eyesight of the assured, John A. Tuttle, and, according to his notion, "the pleasures of earth had gone" and "all was getting blank." Utterly wanting in that courage which buoyed the blind bard:

"Against Heaven's hand or will nor bate a jot,
To argue not
Of heart or hope; but still bear up and steer Right onward,"

—he "burst the ties that bound him to this world." He had been a member of the Iowa Traveling Men's Association since May 1, 1897, and in this action his beneficiary demands the indemnity of $5,000, stipulated in its articles of incorporation and by-laws on account of an injury "effected through or by external, violent, and accidental means." If his life was taken by his own voluntary act while in the possession of all his faculties, it is needless to say that the injury was not "through or by accidental means." If, however, the assured's act, causing death, sprung from an insane impulse of a disordered and unsound mind, it was neither voluntary nor intentional, but "through and by external, violent, and accidental means." On this point there is some conflict of opinion, but this view is sustained by the better reason and by the great weight of authority. Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal. 120 U. S. 527, 30 L. ed. 740, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 686; Blackstone v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 74 Mich. 614, 3 L.R.A. 486, 42 N. W. 156; Grand Lodge I. O. M. A. v. Wieting, 168 Ill. 408, 61 Am. St. Rep. 123, 48 N. E. 59; Healey v. Mutual Acci. Asso. 133 Ill. 556, 9 L.R.A. 371, 23 Am. St. Rep. 637, 25 N. E. 52; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 75.

But the sixth article of incorporation excepted liability in case of death by "suicide while sane or insane," and this condition was valid. Scarth v. Security Mut. Life Soc. 75 Iowa. 346, 39 N. W. 658. Recovery, then, in the absence of any waiver, must be denied, unless it shall be found, as appellant contends it should be, that the contract between the assured and the association was entered into in Missouri, and therefore should be construed according to the laws of that state. This is the main question in the case, for, under the statutes of Missouri, as construed by its court of last resort, suicide as such is not a defense, unless contemplated at the time of the application for insurance, "and any stipulation in the policy to the contrary shall be void" (Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 5855). Logan v. Fidelity & C. Co. 146 Mo. 114, 47 S. W. 948; Brassfield v. Knights of Maccabees, 92 Mo. App. 102. This statute relates not merely to the remedy, but enters into and forms a part of the contract of insurance made within the state. Jarman v. Knights Templars & M. Life Indemnity Co. 95 Fed. 70.

Where, then, was the contract made? The association was organized under the laws of Iowa in 1892, with its principal place of business in the city of Des Moines, Iowa. It employed no agents to solicit applications for membership, but relied on the good offices of its members to induce others to enter the association. To this end, blank applications were inclosed, with notices of assessments and other communications, with the thought that traveling men would direct the attention of their acquaintances of that vocation to the merits of the organization. The deceased resided in Kansas City, Missouri, and April 29, 1897, signed an application, in so far as material, as follows: "Home Office, 305 Youngerman Block, Des Moines, Iowa, Application for Membership. Iowa State Traveling Men's Association. Formed for Mutual Benefit for Traveling Men Only. Benefits: $25.00 weekly indemnity, 52 weeks. $5,000 in case of death. $5,000 loss of both arms or both legs. $5,000 loss of both eyes. $1,250 loss of one eye. $1,250 loss of one hand or one foot. $2,500 for total disability over two years. (Fill this blank and forward to F. E. Haley, Sec'y and Treas., Des Moines, Iowa.) I herewith enclose $4 and apply for membership in the Iowa State Traveling Men's Association. Such membership to be based on the following statement of facts, which are warranted to be true and complete: [Here follow 21 questions and answers.] I do warrant the above to be true, and I hereby agree with the said association that I will comply with the requirements of its constitution and by-laws, which, with this declaration, shall be the basis of membership between myself and the said association. I also agree that the said association shall not be liable under its certificate of membership in any manner, except for bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means, nor shall said association be liable for any injury sustained by me while under the influence of intoxicating liquors or narcotics, or which shall happen on account of, by reason of, or in consequence of, the use thereof; nor for accidental death, loss of limb or sight, disability resulting wholly or partially, directly or indirectly, from any of the following causes, conditions, or acts, or when I am under the influence of, or affected by, any such cause, condition, or act, to wit: Disease; bodily or mental infirmity; hernia; orchitis; fits; vertigo; sleep walking; medical or surgical treatment or amputation (amputation necessitated solely by injuries sustained and made within fifty-two weeks after the accident excepted); voluntary taking of poisons; contact with poisonous ivy; intentional injury inflicted by me; voluntary overexertion; wrestling; racing. And I also agree that this application does not entitle me to any benefits for, or on account of, any injuries sustained by me before it is accepted by the board of directors." He was recommended by Edward Somers, who mailed the application, with the membership fee of $4, at Kansas City, to the secretary of the association at Des Moines. It was received by the latter May 1st, and thereupon promptly "approved and accepted" by the board of directors, and a certificate of membership, together with a copy of the constitution and by-laws, mailed at Des Moines to assured's address at Kansas City.

Counsel for appellant argued that, under this state of facts, the jury might have found that the contract between the association and the assured was effected at Kansas City, and base their contention on two grounds: (1) That Tuttle, in handing the application and fee to Somers, delivered these to the association at Kansas City, and, as he had not made use of the mails in so doing, there was no implied authority given to the association to deliver the certificate and other papers by post, and therefore these were not delivered until they reached him at Kansas City. (2) That the certificate was not responsive to the application, in that the articles and by-laws contained conditions not contemplated by the application, and hence the contract was not effected until the subsequent consent of Tuttle in Kansas City, manifested by the retention of the certificate and the payment of assessments. These will be considered in the order stated.

The first amounts to an assertion that the proposition to become a member was both made and accepted in Missouri, and for this reason the contract was there consummated. But neither of these contentions can be sustained. Somers neither received nor expected compensation, though he may have been in a sense the agent of the association within the meaning of the Missouri statute, that one "who shall receive or receipt for any money from other persons, to be transmitted to any such insurance company or association either in or out of the state [but not authorized to do business in the state] for a policy or policies of insurance issued by such company or association . . . shall be deemed to all intents and purposes an agent . . . of such company or association." Section 5915, Rev. Stat. Mo. 1889. But Somers was not the agent in doing something no one but the board of directors could do. The by-laws of defendant provided that "no person shall be considered as a member, nor shall this association be liable in any manner to any person as a member herein, until said directors have accepted his application, and a certificate of membership has been issued to him." Indeed, the application indicated that, as a condition to insurance, the action of the board of directors was essential. So that, in any event, Somers could not act for the association in passing on the application, and the assured was fully aware that it must be forwarded to Des Moines and there presented to and acted upon by the board of directors of the association. The proposition was to the board of directors, and not to Somers, and, though without information as to any arrangement between them, it may well be assumed, in view of the distance and nature of the business to be transacted, that, in placing the application in the hands of Somers, Tuttle contemplated that he would transmit it to the association by ordinary mode, approved by usage and the general custom of the world; that is, by the government post. Nothing in the application indicated that a response through Somers was desired. It was directed by Tuttle to the association, and the desire of a direct response only was to be inferred. Indeed, the by-laws exacted that it be issued to him. But was authority to respond by mail to be implied? The request to communicate an acceptance by mail may be inferred (1) where the post is used to make the offer and no other mode is suggested, and (2) where the circumstances are such that it must have been contemplated that the post would be made use of in returning an answer. 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 295. In what other way could the assured have anticipated a response? His application had been forwarded by the post. The matter to be transmitted back was suitable for the mails. The distance was such as to preclude thought of personal delivery. There was nothing in the letter of Somers to indicate that it was to be delivered through him, or that either he or Tuttle so desired. We think authority to post the certificate and other papers clearly implied from the circumstances disclosed. The correct rule is well stated in Henthorn v. Fraser [1892] 2 Ch. 27: "Where the circumstances are such that it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that, according to the ordinary usages of mankind, the post might be used as a means of communicating the acceptance of an offer, the acceptance is complete as soon as it is posted." In that case the proposition was handed to plaintiff, who resided at Birkenhead, while at Liverpool. On the following day, at 3:50 p. m., he mailed an acceptance at Birkenhead, which did not reach the defendant's office until 8:30 o'clock of the same evening. On the same day defendant posted a letter withdrawing the offer before 1 o'clock, and it reached plaintiff at 5:30 o'clock in the afternoon. From the residence of plaintiff in another place and the fact that he would likely return there before acting on the offer, having been allowed fourteen days, it was inferred that an answer by mail was contemplated, and, as the contract was completed by mail in the acceptance before plaintiff had knowledge of the attempt to withdraw the offer, it was upheld as completing the contract which was enforced specifically.

The authorities relied on by appellant do not obviate the conclusion stated. In Scottish-American Mortg. Co. v. Davis, 96 Tex. 504, 97 Am. St. Rep. 932, 74 S. W. 17, one Coutts submitted personally a proposition to buy land. This was accepted with a modification. Thereupon Coutts mailed a letter of acceptance, but before it was delivered intercepted it, and procured its return by the postal authorities before its delivery to the seller, and the court held that he was not bound, for the reason that the proposition had not been submitted through the mails, and therefore no implication arose authorizing a response to be so transmitted, and, as the letter was never actually delivered, he was not bound. Whether such an inference might arise from other circumstances was not considered. Other cases cited, as Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 28 Am. Rep. 241, where the instrument sued on was forwarded to take effect in another state, have no bearing on the question at issue. In the circumstances of this case, we have no hesitation in holding that it was contemplated that the mails should be used in forwarding the certificate and other papers to Tuttle, and that such certificate was "issued to him" when duly executed by the officers of the association, inclosed in an envelope duly addressed and stamped, and deposited in the United States mails at Des Moines. See Ferrier v. Storer, 63 Iowa, 487, 50 Am. Rep. 752, 19 N. W. 288; Hunt v. Higman, 70 Iowa, 406, 30 N. W. 769; Moore v. Pierson, 6 Iowa, 279, 71 Am. Dec. 409.

The second ground of counsel's argument, that the contract was made in Missouri, is founded on the proposition that, to constitute a contract, the acceptance of the offer must assent to it entirely and add nothing to it. If the acceptance interposes a new condition, a contract is not effected until this is assented to by the party making the offer. Appellant insists that the conditions of the indemnity contained in the constitution and by-laws were not such as contemplated by the application, in that (1) absolute indemnity was proposed, while that provided was that which might be raised by assessment, and (2) that an exception of death from "suicide while sane or insane" is found in the articles of incorporation, though excluded from the application. It will appear from an examination of the application that the manner of raising the various sums mentioned is not alluded to. For all that appears, they may be raised by any of the methods ordinarily resorted to by life insurance companies. The applicant cannot, then, be said to have proposed any particular method, nor the association in preparing the blank forms to have made any representations with reference thereto. This contention must then be rejected. Decisions construing policies or certificates to stipulate absolute indemnity are not in point, for here the statements are contained, not in the policy or certificate, but in the application therefor; and, when construed in connection with the certificate, which merely declared Tuttle a member and that he was "entitled to all the benefits accruing from such membership, under the provisions of the constitution and by-laws of this association," no doubt can remain that a promise of absolute indemnity was not intended, but such as was provided by the articles of incorporation. Moreover, the application expressly so indicated, as will hereafter appear. An examination of the application will disclose that many exceptions from liability are stated, and from this enumeration it is said that the inference should be drawn that all others were excluded, and therefore that the applicant did not ask for insurance including another exception found in the articles, namely, "death by suicide while sane or insane;" and so defendant, in issuing the certificate to Tuttle, added a condition, and for this reason the contract was not effected until the latter accepted at Kansas City.

But this contention overlooks a very material portion of the application, which reads: "I hereby agree with the said association that I will comply with the requirements of its constitution and by-laws, which, with this declaration, shall be the basis of membership between myself and the said association." It is to be noted that the first clause binds the applicant to observe his duties and obligations due to the association as a member, and this, even though extended to changes in the articles or by-laws, will not authorize the association by amendment to interfere with the other and distinct relations between the association, as insurer, and the member, as insured, as by reducing the amount of indemnity to be paid. Newhall v. Supreme Council A. L. of H. 181 Mass. 111, 63 N. E. 1; Bragaw v. Supreme Lodge, 128 N. C. 354, 54 L.R.A. 602, 38 S. E. 905. By the second clause the constitution and by-laws, with the declaration, is made "the basis of membership between myself and the said association." The application was on the express condition that the articles of incorporation (called constitution) and by-laws were to form the basis of the contract constituting him a member of the association. If, then, exceptions are to be found in the articles not enumerated in the application, they cannot be regarded as new conditions, but the rather of those proposed, though not specifically mentioned. Indeed, the second by-law declared that the certificate of membership, together with the application therefor and the articles of incorporation and by-laws "constitute the contract between the member and this association," and it was undoubtedly in view of this that the stipulation quoted was inserted in the application.

We have not adverted to the contention that defendant was "doing business" in Missouri; for, even though this be true, it could have no bearing in fixing the locus in quo of the particular contract.

The plaintiff also pleaded a waiver of the defense of suicide. In support thereof, it was made to appear that her attorneys wrote to the association on the 17th day of July, 1901, saying: "Mrs. Tuttle is ready to furnish proofs of death and to comply in every respect with the rules and by-laws of the association. If you will kindly forward to us blanks for the proper presentation of the claim, we will see that the same are executed and filled out, and will promptly send them to you. Your early answer hereto will greatly oblige." To this the secretary of the association responded in a letter dated July 20th, but postmarked July 22d, at 5:30 P. M.: "Mr. Tuttle was at the time of his death a member of the association in good standing. We beg, however, to advise you that the association gives to its members and their beneficiaries indemnity only on account of total disability or death caused by accident. There is nothing in your letter to indicate that Mr. Tuttle died as the result of an accident. However, at your request, we forward you blanks. In forwarding you these blanks, it is with a distinct understanding that no rights the association may have are waived. These blanks are sent you for your convenience." The association's attorney had gone to Hutchinson, Kansas, to investigate the cause of death on the 17th and returned on the 21st of July, and the evidence was such that the jury might have found that he had informed the secretary that deceased had committed suicide before the above letter was mailed to plaintiff's attorney, who thereafter at considerable expense had procured the proofs of loss and forwarded them to the association. At their request a few days later a copy of the application and of the articles and by-laws was sent to them.

The plaintiff argues that the principle often applied, that where the insurer, after learning of facts establishing a forfeiture, requires the preparation of proofs of loss, he thereby waives the forfeiture, is applicable. We think otherwise. Nothing was done by plaintiff at the instance or request of the association, nor did its letter carry any assurance, save that the blanks were forwarded merely for their convenience. Proofs of death were exacted as a condition precedent to payment of loss by the by-laws, and the courtesy exhibited in supplying these blanks at the insured's request ought not alone to be construed into a waiver of a defense, which the insurer was then under no obligation to disclose. The test to be applied is whether the acts and conduct of the insurer are inconsistent with the intention to insist on this defense. Lake v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 110 Iowa, 473, 81 N. W. 710, and, as seen, nothing which the association wrote or forwarded can bear such a construction. The court rightly held there was no evidence of waiver.

Affirmed.

Weaver, J., dissenting:

I dissent from the proposition that the certificate is to be treated and construed as an Iowa contract. The application was solicited, made, and delivered in Missouri. The first premium was paid in Missouri. The defendant, without any order or direction from the assured, sent the certificate to him in Missouri. The defendant, in thus doing an insurance business in that state, became subject to its statutes, and its contracts so made are to be construed and enforced according to its laws. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Cravens, 178 U. S. 389, 44 L. ed. 1116, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 902. To hold otherwise and assist the defendant in defeating or avoiding the laws of our sister states is to open the door to the nullification of our insurance statutes, so far as they apply to foreign corporations doing business in this jurisdiction.

Rehearing denied.

ALBERT F. WOAS, Appt.,
v.

ST. LOUIS TRANSIT COMPANY, Resp't.

(198 Mo. 664, 96 S. W. 1017.)

Carrier—injury to passenger by missile—liability.

1. That the motorman of a street car sees a person with something in his hand near the track at a place where the car is not required to stop for passengers, making violent motions toward the car, does not charge him with notice that his failure to stop the car will result in the throwing of a missile at himself which may strike and injure a passenger, and charge him with the duty of protecting the passenger, so as to render the company liable for injury to the passenger by his neglect so to do.

Evidence—indefiniteness.

2. A mere offer of evidence that, prior to the throwing of a missile at a street car to the injury of a passenger, other missiles had been thrown at cars for failure to stop them, is too indefinite.

(October 17, 1906.)

Case Note.—Presumption of negligence in case of injury to passenger by missile thrown from outside:—That the rule that the mere happening of an injury to a passenger while in the hands of a carrier will raise a presumption of negligence is subject to the qualification noted in the case in hand, that the evidence must, in some tangible way, connect the carrier, or its servants, or some of the appliances of transportation, with the happening of the injury, is well established; and this qualification plays an important part in cases of the kind under discussion.

Thus, it was held in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. MacKinney, 124 Pa. 462, 2 L.R.A. 820, 10 Am. St. Rep. 601, 17 Atl. 14, that an injury APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for the city of St. Louis in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Warren D. Isenberg and F. R. Suits, for appellant:

It is the duty of a carrier of passengers to protect its passenger from injury, violence, insult, and ill treatment, from whatever source arising, whether at the hands of its servants, other passengers, or third persons.

Messrs. Boyle & Priest and George W. Easley, with Mr. George T. Priest, for respondent:

To hold this defendant liable it must first be shown that the plaintiff was injured as the result of a direct assault upon him while a passenger upon defendant's car; second, that defendant had reasonable grounds for anticipating that an attack would be made on plaintiff and had the means at hand to prevent it.

Connell v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (Ball v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co.) 93 Va. 44; 32 L.R.A. 792, 57 Am. St. Rep. 786, 24 S. E. 467; Batton v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 77 Ala. 591, 54 Am. Rep. 80; Chicago & A.

to a passenger on a railroad train, sitting next to an open window, by a blow on his eye by some hard substance, probably a piece of coal, hurled with considerable force while the engine of another train was directly opposite the window, passing in another direction, where there is nothing to explain the cause of the accident, does not create a presumption of negligence against the carrier.

And in Thomas v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 148 Pa. 180, 15 L.R.A. 416, 23 Atl. 989, it was held that the mere fact that a passenger seated in a car at an open window was struck on the arm by a missile which he did not see and which could not be found, with sufficient force to fracture the arm, without evidence that anyone was near the train on the outside, who could have inflicted the injury, does not raise a presumption of the carrier's negligence.

No presumption of negligence on the part of a railroad company arises from injury to a passenger by the fall upon a train of a rock which became detached from the natural hillside more than 300 feet from the top of the cut through which the train ran. Fleming v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 158 Pa. 130, 22 L.R.A. 351, 38 Am. St. Rep. 835, 27 Atl. 858.

Where a passenger on an open street car is injured by falling sawdust blowing into her eye while the car is passing beneath an elevated structure which is part of the carrier's railway system, but the cause of the fall of such sawdust is not shown, there is no presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier. Wadsworth v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 182 Mass. 572, 66 N. E. 421.

The mere unexplained fact that a stream of water entered the window of a railway car, wetting and injuring a passenger, is not sufficient evidence to raise a presumption of negligence on the part of the railway company. Spencer v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 105 Wis. 311, 81 N. W. 407.

But where there is something to connect the injury with the means of transportation, or an act of the carrier's servants, a presumption of negligence arises.

Thus, in Texas Midland R. Co. v. Jumper, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 671, 60 S. W. 797, it was held that, where an injury to the eye of a passenger was shown to have been caused by a red-hot cinder from the locomotive of the train, the burden was upon the carrier to prove due care.

So, where a person, while waiting on a depot platform for his train, was struck by a block of coal falling or thrown from a passing train, there is a presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1402, 71 S. W. 516.

R. Co. v. Pillsbury, 123 Ill. 9, 5 Am. St. Rep. 483, 14 N. E. 22; Wright v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 4 Colo. App. 102, 35 Pac. 196; Fewings v. Mendenhall, 88 Minn. 336, 60 L.R.A. 601, 97 Am. St. Rep. 519, 93 N. W. 127.

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 3d of March, 1903, plaintiff filed in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis an amended petition, which, in substance, stated that on the 14th of April, 1902, the defendant was a public carrier of passengers for hire, and as such controlled and operated a street railway along and over Easton avenue, in the city of St. Louis, a street running in an easterly and westerly direction, and on said day plaintiff took passage on one of defendant's east-bound cars at or near Clara avenue, and paid his fare, and was accepted as a passenger on said car. While plaintiff was a passenger on said car, the defendant, its agents, and servants failed and neglected to exercise such care and vigilance and caution as was their duty to do towards plaintiff, and was negligently, improperly, and unlawfully conducting itself; that the plaintiff became exposed to great danger, and in consequence of such negligence and unlawful conduct on the part of defendant, its agents, and servants, was greatly and permanently injured in and about his face and on the right side thereof; that, before the said car reached King's highway, a street running in a northerly and southerly direction across said Easton avenue, some person took a position upon the track of the defendant upon which said car was running, and made violent and threatening motions at and towards the front of the car and at and towards the motorman in charge and running said car on which plaintiff was a passenger, and said motorman saw, or could have seen, said person's threatening motions, attitude, and conduct, and could have reasonably anticipated, in view of the circumstances, that the car was in danger of being attacked, and the passengers thereon liable to be injured, but notwithstanding said threatened danger the said motorman took no steps to prevent an attack upon said car, and took no steps to protect the passengers thereon from said danger, but threw the power on said car in full force and apparently tried to run over the said person on the track; that, when the car was in close proximity to the said person on the track, the said person threw a rock or missile of some hard substance through the front of said car, and said missile struck the plaintiff in the face with great force and violence, permanently injuring the vision of his right eye and paralyzing some of the muscles on the right side of his face, whereby plaintiff has undergone and will undergo much pain and suffering, both mentally and physically, and caused plaintiff to pay out large sums of money for medicine, medical care and attention, and lose much time from his work; that there was in force and in effect at that time an ordinance which defendant was bound to obey, which provided that east-bound cars should be stopped on the east side of intersecting streets to take on passengers where requested, signaled, or motioned by any person standing on said appropriate corner desiring to take passage on such cars. The petition sets forth the ordinance (§ 1761 of article 6 of ordinance No. 19,991 of the city of St. Louis, approved April 3, 1900); and it is further alleged that §§ 1762 and 1772 of said ordinance provide a penalty for the violation of § 1761 for failing to stop said cars upon the request of persons desiring to take passage thereon. It is then alleged that a number of people waiting on the east side of King's highway, and on the south side of Easton avenue, desiring to take passage on the car of which plaintiff was a passenger, signaled the motorman to stop said car so that they might take passage thereon, but the said motorman and servant therein in charge of said car failed, neglected, and refused to stop the same; that the person who threw said missile was provoked thereto by the unlawful conduct of the defendant, its agents, and servants in failing to stop said car at King's highway; that the servants of the defendant then and there could have reasonably anticipated the happening of the said injury to the plaintiff; that at divers times and at sundry other occasions prior to the injury to the plaintiff other persons had hurled missiles at the cars of the defendant on account of the failure of the servants of the defendant to stop said cars as required by said ordinance, and that such persons had been prosecuted for throwing missiles at said street cars; that plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $10,000, for which he prayed judgment.

The answer was a general denial of each and every allegation in the petition. The cause was tried before the court and a jury on the 24th of November, 1903, and at the close of the evidence the jury returned a verdict for the defendant. At the commencement of the trial the defendant objected to any testimony under the petition on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and because the petition showed on its face that whatever injury was sustained by the plaintiff was due to the wrongful act of a stranger to the defendant, over whom defendant had no control whatever, and there was nothing in the pleading to render the defendant responsible for the wrongful act of the said stranger. The court overruled this objection and the defendant duly excepted. The plaintiff then offered to prove that prior to the 14th of April, 1902, missiles had been thrown at the cars of the defendant company on account of the failure of the defendant's servants to stop its cars and allow passengers to board the same, and also to prove that prosecutions had been had against such persons for such unlawful conduct, all of which testimony the court excluded at the request of the defendant, to which action of the court the plaintiff excepted. Plaintiff next offered in evidence § 1761 of the Municipal Code of St. Louis which was pleaded in the petition, and also § 1762 providing a penalty for a violation of § 1761, and also the acceptance of the provisions of said ordinance by the defendant company.

The plaintiff, in his own behalf, testified that he was a linotype operator, and that on the 14th of April, 1902, he took passage on an east-bound Easton avenue car, about a quarter to 6, to go to his work. He paid his fare and took his seat on the right side of the car, fronting east on the second seat from the front of the car; that, when the car approached King's highway, he noticed a man standing in the middle of the street with something in his hand, making violent motions towards the car. The motorman was standing on the platform in front of the car handling his motor. The next thing that the plaintiff remembered was he was on the operating table, and the doctor was taking the glass and broken bones out of his face and teeth. He testified to the wages he was earning before he was hurt and to the amount of his physician's bills, and to the length of time lost from his work on account of the injury. He did not see the man throw anything. He only knew that, when he came to his senses, he was on the operating table in Dr. Parker's office. Dr. Rice testified to the serious nature of the plaintiff's injuries; that, when he reached the plaintiff at Dr. Parker's office, Dr. Parker had already bandaged him up and sent him home. The cheek bone was fractured and the muscles were partially paralyzed, so that he could not close his jaws. John Jack testified that he was a member of the police force and saw a person throw something on the evening of the 14th of April, 1902, at an Easton avenue east-bound car near King's highway. He could not swear that it was a rock, but, whatever the missile was, it struck the vestibule, and broke the pane of glass in front of the vestibule, but whether it struck any person or not he could not say. This was the substance of the plaintiff's evidence. The court, at the request of the defendant, instructed that under the pleadings and the evidence the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and thereupon the jury returned the verdict for the defendant. Within four days plaintiff filed his motion for a new trial, alleging, among other things, error on the part of the court in refusing competent evidence on the part of the plaintiff and in sustaining the demurrer to the evidence, which motion was, by the court, overruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

Two grounds are assigned for a reversal of the judgment, the principal of which is that the court erred in not submitting the case to the jury upon the evidence, and the second is the refusal of the court to permit the plaintiff to show that, on account of the defendant's refusal to stop its cars in accordance with the ordinance, various persons had made attacks upon the cars by throwing missiles at them.

1. In support of this first contention plaintiff invokes the law as to the duty of the carrier of passengers to protect its passengers. A carrier of passengers is required to exercise the highest degree of care in respect to the equipment of its road and transportation facilities, in providing suitable machinery in the operation of its cars, in the employment of competent and faithful servants and agents, and generally as to all acts pertaining in any way to the conduct of its affairs in furtherance of its undertaking as a carrier. In respect to these matters the rule in this state has always held such carriers to a strict accountability. It will be readily seen from the accompanying statement that both the petition and the evidence demonstrated that the act which resulted in the plaintiff's injury in this case was not committed by an employee or a fellow passenger, or by anyone having any connection or relation whatever with the company, but by a stranger, over whom the defendant had no control whatever. It is insisted by the plaintiff, however, that it was the duty of the defendant, in view of the fact that other persons had committed criminal trespasses by hurling stones at the cars of the defendant, to have exercised the utmost care and vigilance to guard and protect the plaintiff while a passenger on this car from acts of violence at the hands of evil-disposed persons, whether under the control of the defendant or not, and that the act of the man who threw the missile which struck the plaintiff could have been reasonably anticipated by the defendant's motorman, and could have been guarded against and prevented.

In Batton v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 77

Ala. 591, 54 Am. Rep. 80, it was held that, while it is the duty of a railroad company as a common carrier to protect its passengers against violence or disorderly conduct on the part of its own agents or other passengers and strangers when such violence or misconduct may be reasonably expected and prevented, yet it is not liable in an action for damages for a wrong when it is not shown that the company had notice of any facts which justify the expectation that a wrong would be committed; and the court in its opinion says: All the cases upon the subject impose the qualification that the wrong or injury done the passenger by strangers must have been of such a character as that it might reasonably have been anticipated or naturally expected to occur. And this statement of the rule has been approved by this court in Sira v. Wabash R. Co. 115 Mo. 135, 136, 37 Am. St. Rep. 386, 21 S. W. 905, and in Connell v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (Ball v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co.) 93 Va. 44, 32 L.R.A. 792, 57 Am. St. Rep. 786, 24 S. E. 467. And it is quite generally ruled by the courts of this country that the liability of the defendant carrier in such a case grows not out of the fact that the passenger was injured, but out of the failure of the carrier's servants to afford protection after they have reasonable grounds for believing that violence to the passenger is imminent; and it is necessary, therefore, in all such cases, to bring home to the conductor or other agent or officer of the company knowledge or opportunity to know that the injury was threatened, and to show that, by his prompt intervention, he could have prevented or mitigated it. New Orleans, St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Burke, 53 Miss. 200, 24 Am. Rep. 689; Britton v. Atlanta & C. Air-Line R. Co. 88 N. C. 536, 43 Am. Rep. 749. It is clear in this case that the burden of showing negligence was upon the plaintiff, and that the presumption of negligence which arises in favor of a passenger traveling on a train from the mere fact of an accident has no application to a case like this. Such a presumption only arises where the injury can be reasonably attributed to some defect in track, cars, or machinery, or the movement of the train, or the conduct of the servants in charge thereof. In Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hummell, 44 Pa. 375, 84 Am. Dec. 457, it was said: "If the law declares, as it does, that there is no duty resting upon any person to anticipate wrongful acts in others and to take precaution against such acts, then the jury cannot say that a failure to take such precautions is a failure in duty and negligence. . . . Were it worth while, abundant authority might be cited to show that the law does not require anyone to presume that another may be . . . an active wrongdoer. . . . It is too well founded in reason, however, to need authority. We act upon it constantly, and without it there could be no freedom of action." In Fredericks v. Northern C. R. Co. 157 Pa. 103, 22 L.R.A. 300, 27 Atl. 689, a passenger was injured by the criminal action of certain parties breaking the locks of a switch and uncoupling cars which stood on a side track and causing loaded coal cars to run out on the main track with which plaintiff's car collided, and it was held by the supreme court of Pennsylvania that the company was not liable for these malicious acts of a stranger of which it had no notice. To the same effect is the decision in Deyo v. New York C. R. Co. 34 N. Y. 9, 88 Am. Dec. 418, in which a train was thrown from the track through the culpable act of some unknown person, who maliciously drew the spikes which fastened the chairs and the rails, whereby a passenger was injured. In Curtis v. Rochester & S. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 534, 75 Am. Dec. 258, it was said: "If obstructions are placed by strangers upon the road, either through accident or design, the company is not responsible for the consequences unless its agents have been remiss in not discovering them." In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. MacKinney, 124 Pa. 462, 2 L.R.A. 820, 10 Am. St. Rep. 601, 17 Atl. 14, it appeared that the plaintiff was a passenger on the defendant's train, and while reading a newspaper in his seat at an open window was struck in the eye by a hard substance and seriously injured. On the trial the court below instructed the jury that they should start with the presumption that the defendant was guilty of negligence from the mere happening of the accident, and that it therefore devolved upon the defendant to rebut that presumption and show it was not negligence. The supreme court held that this instruction was erroneous because the accident occurred from something extraneous to the railroad and the appliances of travel, and that it was necessary for the plaintiff to go further and affirmatively prove that there was negligence. The court pointed out the difference between an accident resulting from the mere operation of the road and one which was the result of some extrinsic cause. In the former the presumption of negligence arose from the mere happening of the accident. In the latter no such presumption arose, and the fact of negligence for which the defendant was responsible must be proved by different testimony just as in any ordinary case between strangers. The foregoing cases sufficiently indicate the principles which must govern in the decision of this case.

It being conceded that plaintiff's injury resulted from the unlawful, wanton, and wicked act of a stranger, over whom defendant had no control, was there anything in the evidence which would justify the circuit court in submitting to the jury whether the defendant could have reasonably anticipated that this stranger would have hurled the rock or other missile into the car where plaintiff was seated in time for the defendant's motorman to have taken steps to have prevented it. While plaintiff urges in his petition that the party who threw the stone stood on the track on which defendant's car in which plaintiff was riding was moving, the plaintiff's evidence clearly shows that this party was not on the track, but stood between the east and west bound tracks, and not on the corner where a passenger was authorized to hail the car to stop. It is too plain for argument that the motorman was under no obligation to stop the car for a party not at the proper point. There is not the slightest pretense that this motorman had any reason to expect this party to be on the track at this place until his car approached him; nor is there the slightest evidence that he had any right to anticipate that this stranger would violate the law by throwing a deadly missile at the motorman. The question at bar has been so recently and ably discussed by the supreme court of Minnesota, in the case of Fewings v. Mendenhall, 88 Minn. 336, 60 L.R.A. 601, 97 Am. St. Rep. 519, 93 N. W. 127, that we quote from that case the conclusions of law applicable to the facts before us. We premise our quotation, however, by remarking that in this case there was no mob or other circumstances which characterized the Minnesota case. The defendant in that case was the receiver of the Duluth Street Railway Company and as such was operating the road. "On May 2, 1899, a general strike was inaugurated by the employees of the company, which was maintained until after the plaintiff was injured as hereinafter stated. The defendant procured other men to take the places of the strikers and continued to operate the street-car lines. On Sunday evening, May 7th, the plaintiff took passage in the car operated by the defendant at Superior, in the state of Wisconsin, for Duluth. While the car was going northerly along Garfield avenue, in Duluth, and as it approached Michigan street, a young man not in any way . . . under the control or direction of defendant threw a stone at the car in which plaintiff was so riding, which passed through the window thereof and struck plaintiff on the head, whereby he was seriously injured." Plaintiff sued the receiver and based his right to recover on the alleged negligence of the defendant in failing to take proper precaution to prevent injury 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

from acts of that kind. It was held that the defendant was not guilty of negligence in attempting to operate the cars during the strike. Said the court: "It is insisted that that act of the boy who threw the stone in question was such as the defendant might, from the circumstances and conditions of the strike, reasonably have anticipated and could have guarded against and prevented. We have been cited to no case where the high degree of care essential as to matters within the control of the carrier has been extended and applied with all its force and strictness to acts of persons beyond its control, and for which it was in no way responsible, directly or indirectly. Some cases cited and relied upon by the plaintiff do not sustain his position."

The court then reviewed a large number of cases, and showed that they had no application to the question under discussion, and then proceeded as follows: "A number of other cases are cited and relied upon by counsel wherein the general rule is stated substantially as contended for by him, namely, that a carrier of passengers is required to exercise the utmost vigilance to protect passengers from insult and injury from whatever cause arising; but an examination of them shows that they are all cases where the carrier had permitted third persons to enter upon its premises or cars and thereafter failed to exercise a proper degree of care to restrain them from acts of lawlessness, and there can be no question as to their soundness. The question before us is whether this strict rule applies to the act of a stranger such as here shown. That it does not is sustained by some very respectable authorities. Tall v. Baltimore Steam Packet Co. 90 Md. 248, 47 L.R.A. 120, 44 Atl. 1007; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. MacKinney, 124 Pa. 462, 2 L.R.A. 820, 10 Am. St. Rep. 601, 17 Atl. 14; Thomas v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 148 Pa. 180, 15 L.R.A. 416, 23 Atl. 989; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Pillsbury, 123 Ill. 9, 21, 5 Am. St. Rep. 483, 14 N. E. 22. In our opinion it would be unjust to require a carrier of passengers, either a steam or street railway company, to exercise the utmost care and vigilance to guard and protect passengers from criminal acts of strangers, persons not under its control, or subject to its orders, and for whose acts it is not in any way responsible. And we hold, without further discussion as respects the acts of such strangers, that carriers of passengers are liable for the exercise of ordinary care and prudence only. Such carrier is liable for all injuries resulting from the acts of strangers which are reasonably to be anticipated under the particular circumstances, and which ordinary care and prudence, had they been exercised, would have prevented. . . . The familiar rule that evidence of an accident is prima facie proof of negligence against the carrier can have no application to this case because the act resulting in the injury did not arise from any act or omission of defendant. The presumption of negligence in such cases arises only where the thing causing the injury complained of was under the exclusive control of the carrier or its servants or employees. The act complained of here being that of a stranger, it was incumbent upon plaintiff affirmatively to prove that defendant failed to exercise proper care to prevent it. The question arises whether the evidence was sufficient to charge defendant with negligence in this respect." The court then discussed the two theories advanced by the plaintiff. One was that the defendant might have protected the plaintiff by stretching a heavy canvass over the windows outside of the car, or have caused its leather curtains to have been pulled down. The other was to have informed the plaintiff that violent and lawless acts were being committed by the strikers and their sympathizers. The court held that ordinary care did not require of the defendant to take doubtful or unreasonable precaution to guard against the lawless acts of strangers, and that, as to the duty to notify the plaintiff of the violent conduct of some of the strikers, that plaintiff was bound to know of those things as much as the defendant, and it was unreasonable to suppose that, had defendant given plaintiff this warning, it would have had the effect of protecting him; and the court held that, upon the whole record, the evidence was insufficient to charge the defendant with actionable negligence.

Another leading case on this subject is that of Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Pillsbury, 123 Ill. 9, 5 Am. St. Rep. 483, 14 N. E. 22. In that case a railroad company stopped at a place not a usual stopping place and took aboard laborers who had taken the place of some strikers. The police guarded the laborers until they entered the train. When the train stopped at a railroad crossing, 1½ miles beyond, it was boarded by a mob, who attacked the laborers as scabs and shot the plaintiff, a passenger on the train at the time. Scott, J., speaking for the majority of the court, said: "With regard to danger and hazard to travel arising otherwise than on the train, and not incidents of such travel, the degree of care to be observed to discover and prevent all danger to and consequent injuries to passengers must depend in a large measure on the attendant circumstances. No doubt in many cases, if the carrier observes ordinary care and diligence to discover and prevent injury to passengers, such as any prudent person would do for his own personal safety, it will be exonerated from liability. In other cases and under other circumstances it will, no doubt, be the duty of the carrier to exercise the utmost care, skill, and diligence to protect the passengers from danger and injury, so far as the same, by the exercise of such care, and skill, and diligence, could have been reasonably and practically foreseen and anticipated in time to prevent injury. . . . Prior to the time the plaintiff was injured the box cars containing these laborers had been assailed, and it might reasonably have been inferred that danger to passenger cars on the same account was imminent, and common prudence should have induced the taking of extraordinary precautionary measures. . . . Under the circumstances, the law would charge defendant with negligence in stopping a train filled with passengers, in the midst of a howling, revengeful, lawless mob, to take on persons whom the mob were seeking an opportunity to maltreat. . . . Defendant ought reasonably to have anticipated the mob might attack its train to reach the object of their vengeance so soon as it had passed from the protection of the police, and precautionary measures should have been taken . . . to prevent the injury to passengers. The verdict is a sufficient warrant for the conclusion that reasonable precautions were not observed." Magruder, J., entered a most vigorous dissent from the conclusions reached by the majority.

It is to be observed that in this case the opinion of the majority of the court is predicated upon the fact that the circumstances themselves charge the defendant with notice of the danger to its passengers from an attack of a mob of strikers, and the duty of the carrier under such circumstances to exercise that skill and diligence commensurate with the threatened danger. In both of the cases last cited it is to be observed that the plaintiffs proceeded upon the theory that the carrier was advised of the danger to its passengers and failed to exercise the proper care for their protection. It is obvious that the facts of the case at bar are wholly dissimilar from those two cases, in that in this case there was a total absence of any mob or other public disturbance which would of itself indicate to the defendant any danger to its passengers on the car on which plaintiff was riding. Here the act which caused the injury was the wanton, unlawful act of one man who had assumed to himself the prerogative of punishing the motorman for not stopping the car where he thought it ought to be stopped. In the Fewings Case and in the Pillsbury Case the assaults were aimed at the passengers on the cars, and not merely at a motorman or engineer. It was the threatened injury to the passengers and notice thereof upon which those actions were grounded. In this case it is not pretended that the motorman had any notice of any impending attack upon the plaintiff or the other passengers, nor was any attack made directly upon the passenger, but the attack was directed solely against the motorman, and it was only because of its mis-carriage that plaintiff was injured. All the evidence shows that the attack was made with the sole intention and purpose of injuring the motorman, and to hold that the defendant, under this evidence, was bound to anticipate injury to its passengers would be contrary to reason and common sense. The motorman was standing alone in the vestibule, controlling the action of his car; and it would be utterly unreasonable to hold that he could reasonably anticipate that a person attempting to strike him would inflict injury upon the passengers in the coach. As already shown by the authorities cited, the motorman was not bound to anticipate that this stranger who was hailing his car would be guilty of a criminal assault upon himself or upon his passengers. The circumstances in evidence did not indicate any purpose on the part of this lawless offender to maltreat the passengers on that car. That carriers of passengers are not liable for injuries caused by missiles thrown by strangers which they have no right to anticipate is established by a large number of well-considered cases. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. MacKinney, 124 Pa. 462, 2 L.R.A. 820, 10 Am. St. Rep. 601, 17 Atl. 14; Fewings v. Mendenhall, 88 Minn. 336, 60 L.R.A. 601, 97 Am. St. Rep. 519, 93 N. W. 127; Thomas v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 148 Pa. 180, 15 L.R.A. 416, 23 Atl. 989. Knowledge of the existence of the danger, or of facts and circumstances from which danger may be reasonably anticipated, is necessary to fix the liability of the carrier for damages sustained in consequence of failure to guard against it.

In view of the foregoing legal principles and the evidence in this case, we think the circuit court correctly sustained the demurrer to the evidence, as the plaintiff wholly failed to bring himself within any rule of law which would render the defendant liable for the assault of the person made upon its motorman.

2. The only remaining ground is that the court excluded certain evidence offered by the plaintiff to show that, prior to the 14th of April, 1902, certain persons had thrown missiles at the defendant's cars on account of their failure to stop and allow passengers to board the car. It is obvious that the evidence sought to be adduced had no limitations whatever, save that missiles were thrown at the defendant's cars at some time prior to April 14, 1902. The questions asked would have permitted the witnesses to have told of sporadic cases of the throwing of missiles at defendant's cars during a period extending over years prior to the 14th of April, 1902. Moreover, the question did not indicate that such conduct was by any means general or of such frequency as to indicate that it would be repeated on the occasion on which plaintiff was hurt. The evidence sought to be elicited was entirely too indefinite to be of any probative effect whatever. We are cited to the case of Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Dawson, 31 Ind. App. 605, 68 N. E. 909, from the appellate court of Indiana. The evidence offered in this case falls far short of the testimony which was ruled competent in that case. We think the court committed no error whatever in excluding the testimony for the reason that it was entirely too indefinite as to time, and for the further reason that it did not purport to show any such state of affairs as to bring home notice to the defendant of any danger to the plaintiff of the assault by which he was injured.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must be, and is, affirmed.

CHARLES DUFFY, JR.,

v.

FIDELITY·MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

(142 N. C. 103, 55 S. E. 79.)

Insurance—assessment—notice—by-law.

A by-law of an insurance company that the mailing of notices of assessments may be conclusively shown by the certificate of an officer of the corporation who is not required to be personally cognizant of the fact is unreasonable and void.

(September 25, 1906.)

Case Note.—Mode of proving the mailing of notice of maturity of premiums or assessments: —Research has served only to confirm the impression entertained by the court in the case in hand as to the absence of any other decision passing upon the validity of a by-law or contract provision making the certificate of an officer or employee of an insurance company conclusive evidence of the mailing of notice of the maturity of premiums or assessments.

But it has been held that an affidavit as to the publication and mailing of a paper published by an insurance order through which calls for assessments were made is admissible. Rambousek v. Supreme Council, M. T. 119 Iowa, 263, 93 N. W. 277.

Testimony of the secretary of a benefit association as to the customary method of APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Craven County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful cancellation of an insurance policy. Affirmed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

This action is prosecuted by plaintiff for the alleged wrongful cancellation of a policy of insurance by defendant; plaintiff claiming as damages the premiums paid and interest thereon. Defendant admitted the cancellation, and justified by alleging that, plaintiff having failed to pay premium when due, the policy, by its terms, became void. The controversy arises upon the question whether the notice of the assessment was given to plaintiff according to the terms of the policy and by-laws of the association. The two issues material to be considered in disposing of this appeal are: "(1) Was a notice of assessment of July 1, 1903, which was payable July 31, 1903, duly directed to the plaintiff at New Bern, North Carolina, which address appeared at the time on the books of the company, deposited on July 1, 1903, postage prepaid, in the postoffice in Philadelphia? Answer: No. (2) Was the notice of July 1, 1903, assessment received by plaintiff at his address in New Bern, North Carolina? Answer: No." It was in evidence that, at the date of the policy, April 12, 1883, and by its terms, the assessments were due and payable to Joel Kinsey, Trustee, at New Bern, North Carolina; that payments were made to said trustee until some time prior to July 1, 1903, when the by-law was so amended that the assessment became payable to the company in Philadelphia; that, after the change in the by-law, plaintiff made several payments of assessments by sending same to Philadelphia. Defendant introduced article 5, § 9, of the by-sending out notices is competent for the purpose of proving that a particular notice was mailed, although he had no distinct or independent recollection thereof, and in the majority of cases did not personally see the letters or envelopes containing the notices put in the letter box or postoffice, but turned them over to his clerk for mailing. National Union v. Shipley, 92 Ill. App. 355.

Testimony by the secretary of such an association as to his custom of mailing a notice to each member, although he has no independent recollection of the particular notice in question, is prima facie evidence that notice was given. National Union v. Hunter, 99 Ill. App. 146, Affirmed in 197 Ill. 478, 64 N. E. 356.

Such testimony will warrant the jury in finding that notice was sent. Backdahl v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 46 Minn. 61, 48 N. W. 454.

But it has been held that, where the secretary had no personal recollection of mailing the notice in question, though he felt sure that he had mailed it, and there was some inferential evidence to the contrary, the proof was not sufficient. Payn v. Mutual Relief Soc. 2 How. Pr. N. S. 220.

Evidence showing that a notice of assessment was placed in an envelope addressed to the assured, and put upon a desk from which it was the habit of the mail carrier, every time he delivered letters, to take the letters so left, and presumably deposit them in the postoffice, was held insufficient to justify a holding that the notice was ever mailed, in Malloy v. Supreme Council, C. M. B. A. 93 Iowa, 504, 61 N. W. 928.

And in Hastings v. Brooklyn L. Ins. Co. 138 N. Y. 473, 34 N. E. 289, it was held that, where the secretary of the insurance company testified that he wrote and signed an order notifying the insured that his policy would be canceled for nonpayment of his premium note, and inclosed it in a sealed envelope directed to the insured, with a notice upon it to return unless delivered, which was put in a basket in the office where letters for mailing were usually placed; and the porter in the office testified that his business was to take the letters from the basket and mail them, that he mailed all letters found in the basket, but had no recollection of ever seeing or handling this particular letter; and where, on the other hand, it was shown that no such letter was found among the letters or papers of the deceased, and, aside from what the porter testified as to mailing, there was no fact or circumstance shown that would warrant the conclusion that he had received it,—it could not be held, as a matter of law, that the facts shown established the mailing of the letter, although they might warrant such a finding by the jury.

Evidence that the usual course of business required the sending of notice of assessment, and that the books of the company indicated that such notice was sent, is not conclusive as to the fact of sending, although it may be considered by the jury. King v. Masonic Life Asso. 87 Hun, 591, 34 N. Y. Supp. 563.

Where testimony is given that the secretary, by the aid of another, made out notices of assessment to all members in good standing, placing them in a cupboard, afterward comparing them with a list of such members, when they were placed in a trunk or box, and the agent of the company went with it as it was conveyed to the postoffice and saw them delivered, and signed the list on the books to indicate their delivery at the postoffice, no person being able to testify that the notice in question was one of those delivered, or that the assured was one of such members in good standing; and it appeared that the assured never received such notice, and that previous notices of assessment had been sent to her very irregularly,—the question as to whether such notice was actually mailed is for the jury.

laws, as amended, as follows: "A printed or written notice directed to the address of a member, as it appears at the time on the books of the association, and deposited in the office at Philadelphia, shall be deemed a legal and sufficient notice of mortuary calls and dues. A certificate made by the treasurer or bookkeeper showing such facts shall be taken and accepted as conclusive evidence of the mailing of such notice." Defendant thereupon introduced a certificate made by O. C. Bosbyshell, treasurer, stating that on July 1, 1903, a notice of assessment, directed to the plaintiff, was deposited in the postoffice of the city of Philadelphia inclosed in an envelope, postage prepaid, etc., concluding: "And this certificate is made by me, the treasurer of said company, in conformity with the by-laws of the said association, which are a part of said policy; and attached hereto is a true and correct transcript of the records of the company made at that time, showing the mailing of such notice, being the affidavit of the mailing clerk," etc. Following this certificate is the affidavit of S. E. Haines, clerk, who states that he has charge of the preparation and mailing of notices for premiums upon policies issued by defendant. That on the 7th day of July, 1903, he deposited the notices referred to in certain sheets attached, addressed to the persons named, etc. This affidavit bears date July 1, 1903, and attached thereto is a sheet showing notice of assessment mailed to plaintiff at New Bern, North Carolina. There is no controversy regarding the amount of the assessment. Plaintiff was asked the following question: "Did you ever receive any notice or demand for payment of assessment for July 1, 1903?"

Jackson v. Northwestern Mut. Relief Assn. 78 Wis. 463, 47 N. W. 733.

By the New York statute requiring the mailing of a notice of the maturity of a premium as a condition precedent to the forfeiture of a policy for nonpayment of premium, it is provided that the affidavit of the person authorized by the statute to mail such notice shall be presumptive evidence of such notice having been given.

But where no proof is offered that the person making the affidavit was one of the persons mentioned in the statute as authorized to mail the notice, other than statements contained in the affidavit itself, such affidavit is not admissible in evidence. Fischer v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 37 App. Div. 575, 56 N. Y. Supp. 260. (In affirming this case in 167 N. Y. 178, 60 N. E. 431, the court of appeals declined to express an opinion on this point.)

An affidavit which fails to show that the notice related to the policy in suit, and which does not give the contents of the notice that its sufficiency may be determined, is insufficient to show compliance with the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Defendant objected. Objection overruled. Defendant excepted. Answer: "I have never received a notice for July, 1903." The defendant requested certain special instructions, which are set out in the opinion. The jury answered both issues in the negative. From a judgment upon the verdict defendant appealed.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the view which we take of this appeal, several of the questions presented by the exceptions and argued in the brief become immaterial. The injury to which the first issue is directed lies at the threshold of the controversy. The answer to that question, in our opinion, is decisive of the case. The authorities cited by the learned counsel for defendant fully sustain the validity of the contract contained in the policy, declaring that by mailing the notice, properly addressed, to the plaintiff the defendant discharges its duty in that respect. The authorities are practically uniform in holding that a by-law of an assessment insurance company providing that notice may be given members of assessments by mailing, properly addressed, is valid and binding upon the members. Yoe v. Benjamin C. Howard Masonic Mut. Benev. Asso. 63 Md. 86; Epstein v. Mutual Aid & Ben. L. Ins. Asso. 28 La. Ann. 938; Niblack, Ben. Soc. § 260. It is equally well settled that the by-laws of such association when assented to by the member, as provided in the charter, constitute the measure of duty and liability of the parties, provided they are reasonable, and not in violation of any principle of public law. There was evidence proper for the consideration of the jury tending to show that Dr. Duffy knew of the change in the by-law by which the assessment became payable in Philadelphia. The authorities are uniformly to the effect that when the duty is imposed upon the company to mail the notice, in order to sustain a forfeiture, it must show affirmatively that the notice was mailed, properly addressed, within the time fixed. "The giving of notice is a condition precedent, and good standing is not lost by a failure to pay an assessment, of which no notice was given through the fault or misconduct of a supreme lodge, or society, or its officers." Niblack, Ben. Soc. § 257. In the absence of any contract or by-law to the contrary, actual notice must be shown, not only mailing, but the receipt of the notice. But, as we have seen, the parties here have contracted that mailing shall be taken as notice. The defendant seeks to show conclusively by the certificate of the treasurer that the notice was mailed, and excepts to the testimony of plaintiff that it was not received. For the purpose of sustaining this exception the defendant relies upon the by-law declaring that such certificate shall be taken as conclusive evidence of the fact of mailing. This contention presents the question whether the by-law so providing is valid. There can be no question that a corporation may make reasonable by-laws not inconsistent with its charter. "In its operation between the corporation and its members, a by-law, in order to be valid, must not to be unreasonable, oppressive, or extortionate." 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 357; Allnutt v. Subsidiary High Court, U. S. A. O. of F. 62 Mich. 110, 28 N. W. 802. Whether a by-law is reasonable is a question of law for the court. 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 358.

A diligent investigation by the learned and industrious counsel for both parties and ourselves fails to discover any authority or discussion of the exact question presented by this appeal. The numerous cases sustaining contracts by which the parties agree to submit questions arising between them to arbitration, or to the estimate of one or more persons chosen in advance, give us but little aid in the solution of this question. "By-laws restricting the right to sue in the courts are generally void." 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 361. While the by-law relied upon by defendant does not in express terms undertake to deprive the plaintiff of his right, in common with all other citizens, to sue in the courts for redress of his grievance, the practical effect of the right claimed to close the door to inquiry in respect to the controverted fact is to keep the promise to the ear and break it to the heart. If one of the officers of the corporation may, by an ex parte unsworn certificate, conclusively close an inquiry into the fact, it would be an idle thing to go into court and impanel a jury only to be told that no evidence will be heard by them. While the courts will, and should, cautiously exercise the power of declaring contracts, solemnly made by parties, void as being unreasonable, they should at the same time carefully scrutinize contracts, the purpose and effect of which is to prevent the citizen from having his rights passed upon and enforced by the courts of the state, by the means and methods which experience has shown to be best adapted to that purpose. It would seem that to sustain a by-law making such certificate presumptive evidence is as far as the courts should go in that direction. Without attributing to the officer any corrupt motive, we cannot fail to recognize the truth, taught by experience, that those whose duty requires the daily mailing of large numbers of letters cannot retain any personal memory of the particular letters mailed, and are compelled to rely upon the record made by them at the time. Such record should have, and always does have, great weight in establishing the fact recorded. It has never been held that such records made by persons engaged in private business are conclusive evidence of such facts. Based upon reasons of public policy, certain public records import absolute verity and may not be contradicted, but such reasons do not extend to private entries. The rules of evidence are relaxed to the extent of permitting them to be introduced as entries, within well-defined limitations. Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Seaboard Air-Line R. Co. 138 N. C. 42, 107 Am. St. Rep. 517, 50 S. E. 452; Greenl. Ev. § 120. To go beyond this, and allow private corporations, by means of by-laws, to make acts of their own officers conclusive evidence, is, so far as our researches inform us, without precedent, and we think would be an unreasonable and dangerous innovation upon common right.

It will be observed that the by-law does not require the certificate of the treasurer to state a fact within his own knowledge. He is not required to certify that he mailed the notice, or that he saw some other person do so, but may, as in this case he undertook to do, rely upon the statement of an office boy or any other servant or employee of the company. Certainly to permit such certificate to have the conclusive effect claimed would put every member of the defendant company in the absolute power of the corporation. It is said that there is a presumption, founded upon experience, that a letter duly posted, prepaid, and properly addressed reaches its destination. The jury have found upon the second issue that Dr. Duffy never received the notice. It appears from the mailing sheet that other notices mailed at the same time were received. The only reasonable explanation of this condition of the matter is that the notice was not mailed. The burden of proof was on the defendant to show the mailing. There is another view of the question upon which we think the testimony was competent. If a by-law of this character were valid, it should certainly be construed strictly and the certificate be required to comply with its terms. After stating the facts in regard to the mailing, the treasurer proceeds to say: "This certificate is made by me, the treasurer of said company, in conformity with the provisions of the by-laws of the said association, which are a part of said policy; and attached hereto is a true and correct transcript of the records of the company made at that time, showing the mailing of such notice, being the affidavit of the mailing clerk, and one of the sheets referred to therein." It is thus made apparent that he is relying upon the affidavit of Mr. Haines, which is attached to this certificate. His statement therefore is based upon hearsay, and we are thus invited to make a second departure from well-settled rules of evidence. To do so would further endanger the rights of the members of the association. We have carefully examined the numerous cases cited by counsel for the defendant, and, as conceded by them, they do not decide the question presented upon this record. The recognition by the courts of contracts to submit questions to arbitration is based upon a principle not applicable to this case. We are of opinion that his honor committed no error in admitting the testimony of Dr. Duffy. The jury having found the fact against the defendant's contention, upon the first issue, it is unnecessary to consider the other questions discussed in the brief. The by-law relied upon is unreasonable and invalid.

Upon an examination of the entire record we find no error.

ANNA OLIVER, Appt.,
v.
FRED SYNHORST, Resp't.

(— Or. —, 86 Pac. 376.)

Street—encroachment—estoppel.

A municipal corporation which fails to assert its title to a street dedicated to public use, and permits an abutting property owner to improve his property at large expense, with reference to what he supposes in good faith to be the true street boundary line, and maintain the improvements for a period of thirteen years, will be estopped from asserting a title which will practically destroy the value of the abutting property for residence purposes, and work irremediable injury to the owner.

Case Note.—Effect of improvements by abutting owner with reference to what is erroneously supposed to be the street boundary line, to estop the municipality from asserting the true line: — The overwhelming weight of authority will be found to support the proposition that those rights and powers pertaining to municipalities that are public in their nature, such as the control of roads and streets, cannot be lost merely through the lapse of time and the laches of municipal officers. The question, however, whether title can be acquired to public highways by adverse possession is beyond the scope of this note, which is limited to cases presenting the specific question whether, by standing idly by and permitting an abutting owner to make improvements upon his property with reference to what he believes in good faith to be the correct line of the highway, the municipal authorities are to be estopped from establishing the true line, if its establishment would necessitate the removal of such improvements or their irremediable injury.

A review of the cases upon this point will make clear not only that there is an irreconcilable conflict of authority as to whether the municipal officers may ever be estopped by their conduct to assert title to a portion of a highway claimed by an adjoining owner, but also that, even among those courts that have sought to apply the doctrine of equitable estoppel under such circumstances, no hard and fast principle has as yet been recognized that is capable of application to all cases. Judge Dillon's ideas, as set forth in the passages from his great work quoted in OLIVER v. SYNHORST, seem to have been very generally followed, with the result that every case is, indeed, almost a law unto itself.

The nearest approach, however, to a clear and consistent statement of the principle underlying the application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel to municipal corporations and their control of highways is found

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Union County in defendant's favor in a suit to enjoin defendant from interfering with plaintiff's fence and property. Reversed.

Statement by Bean, Ch. J.:

This is a suit to enjoin the defendant, as street superintendent of La Grande, from removing or interfering with a fence and sidewalk of the plaintiff along the north side of lots 3, 4, and 5 in block 74 of Chaplin's addition to La Grande, and from destroying or in any manner interfering with her shade trees, ornamental trees, and shrubbery thereon. The complaint, after the preliminary allegations, avers that on July 14, 1884, Daniel Chaplin and C. H. Prescott, trustee, filed in the office of the clerk of Union county and caused to be recorded a plat of Chaplin's addition to the city of La Grande, in the Illinois decisions. Thus, in Joliet v. Werner, 166 Ill. 34, 46 N. E. 780, it was held that a city was estopped to establish the true line of a street in such a manner as to take a strip of land more than 6 feet wide between an abutting owner's house and the street fence, and nearly 2 feet off the side of his house, where it appeared that such owner had built the house more than forty years before, and had been in actual possession of the land claimed by the city as part of the street for a period of more than thirty-five years, and the city had accepted the sidewalk as built by him about the same time as the house, and had itself afterwards constructed a sidewalk upon the same line, and had built a culvert up to such sidewalk, and had graveled the street along it, and had levied an assessment for the purpose of paying the cost of building the walk as then located. The court said: "While it cannot be maintained that, as respects public rights, municipal corporations are within ordinary limitation statutes, yet the principle of estoppel in pais may be applied to such acts by a municipal corporation as have been above designated. In applying the principle of an estoppel in pais the courts are left to decide the question, not by the mere lapse of time, but by all the circumstances of the case, and to hold the public estopped or not as right and justice may require."

And in Jordan v. Chenoa, 166 Ill. 530, 47 N. E. 191, a city was held to be estopped from asserting title to an alley, where it appeared that an adjoining property owner had been in the open and notorious possession thereof for more than twenty years, and had growing trees therein, and a house standing on a part of it, and a hedge fence growing across the end of it. To quote from the opinion: "Where streets and alleys have been dedicated and accepted they are held by the municipality in its public capacity. They are held in trust for the benefit of the general public, and when so held the upon which was shown a street running east and west along the north side of block 74 and designated as O street, "but that the city of La Grande never accepted the donation of said O street along the north side of said block 74, and said street at said point was closed and by nature impassable until five or six years ago, when private individuals made a narrow grade or wagon track up the hill, along and some distance from the north side of said block 74, and the city exercised no right or control over said street until the fall of 1904, when the city council passed a pretended ordinance requiring a sidewalk to be built along the north side of said block 74; that in the fall of 1891 one T. D. Remington bought lots 4, 5 and 6 in said block 74, and built a fence around the same, and built a large house on said lot 5, and planted shade trees around said lots, and since said time this plaintiff and her grantors have had said premises inclosed continuously up to where her fence now stands on the north side of lots 4 and 5 on O street, claiming in good faith to own the same, and that the plaintiff is the owner thereof, without any objections from said city of La Grande, and with the knowledge and consent of said city; and, about the year 1897, with the knowledge and consent of said city of La Grande, this plaintiff, at great cost, constructed an iron fence along the north side of said lot 5 and along the north end of said lot 5 and along the north end of said lot 4 about 150 feet on said O street in said city of La Grande, the same being along the same line where statute of limitations will not run in favor of a private individual to bar the rights of the public. But, while the statute of limitations does not apply in cases of this character, the defense of equitable estoppel from abandonment or nonuser may be invoked." The court also approved the principle enunciated in Lee v. Mound Station, 118 Ill. 304, 8 N. E. 759, that the doctrine of equitable estoppel would apply "where the public have long withheld the assertion of control over streets, and private parties have been, by the acts of those representing the public, induced to believe the streets abandoned by the public, and on the faith of that belief, and with the acquiescence of those representing the public, they have placed themselves, by making structures or improvements in the street, in a situation where they must suffer great pecuniary loss if those representing the public be allowed afterwards to allege that the street was not abandoned."

Joliet v. Werner, supra, was quoted at length and with approval, and its principles applied, in Itasca v. Schroeder, 182 Ill. 192, 55 N. E. 50, in which a city was held to be estopped from changing the location of a street so as to encroach upon the grounds of an abutting property owner, where it appeared that such change would necessitate the removal of half of a factory built more than thirty years, a portion of a blacksmith shop, and a tenement house, and the cutting down of trees planted twenty years.

But this doctrine is of no avail where no valuable or lasting improvements have been made by the abutting owner upon the portion of the street claimed by him. Accordingly, it was held in Sullivan v. Tichenor, 179 Ill. 97, 53 N. E. 561, that a city was not estopped from building a sidewalk on the true line of a public street by the mere fact that a portion of it was fenced in, and along the fence a sidewalk was constructed by others than the municipal authorities. The court did not deny the proposition that a municipal corporation would be estopped where justice and right required that it should be, but did not consider sufficient for such purpose the mere naked fact of possession by the property owner and nonuser for a long time by the public.

And in De Kalb v. Luney, 193 Ill. 185, 61 N. E. 1036, the court refused to hold a city estopped to establish the true line of a street, where it appeared that the only improvements placed upon the disputed land by the abutting owner were an inexpensive wooden picket fence, a maple tree about ten years old, a lilac bush, a creeping vine, and growing grass; deeming that the loss of these things did not present such a case of hardship and sacrifice that right and justice demanded an estoppel on the part of the public. The court said that the mere possession of a portion of a street was not sufficient to create an estoppel. Nor could any acts of abandonment on the part of the city officers, "though expressly made and declared, operate to create the estoppel, for it is not within the lawful exercise of the power of such authorities to abandon the streets which they hold for the use of the public, so that by the mere act of abandonment rights of the public therein may be lost. It must appear, to create an equitable estoppel against the public in cases such as that at bar, not only that the city authorities have long withheld the assertion of control over the portion of the street in question, and that private parties have been, by the acts of those representing the public, induced, in good faith, to believe the street has been abandoned by the public, but also that, on the faith of that belief, and with the acquiescence of those representing the public, such private party has erected structures on the street, or made improvements thereon, of such lasting and valuable character that to permit the public to assert the right to repossess itself of the premises would entail such great pecuniary loss and sacrifice upon the private property holder that justice and right would demand that the public be estopped."

The principle under consideration was also asserted by the supreme court of South Carolina in Crocker v. Collins, 37 S. C. 327, 34 Am. St. Rep. 757, 15 S. E. 951, in which it plaintiff's grantor constructed said fence in the fall of 1891; and, with the like knowledge and consent of said city, the plaintiff and her grantors hauled earth at great cost, and filled in said lot from her said fence to her dwelling house, and improved said lot and ground, and made a fine lawn thereon, and planted valuable shade and ornamental trees along said fence, and planted and propagated a very fine rose garden within said inclosure and next to said fence and made improvements on her said dwelling house at great cost, all of which was done in good faith by this plaintiff and with the knowledge and consent of said city of La Grande many years ago, and without any objections from said city, the plaintiff believing them to be on her own land; that, several years ago, the plaintiff, being the owner of lot 3 in said block 74, the same being on a steep hillside, blasted out and excavated said lot at great expense, and constructed a barn thereon, and left sufficient room between the barn and the supposed north line of said lot for the convenient use and occupation of said barn, and so that hay and feed could be hauled along said barn and inside of the supposed north line of said lot for delivery in said barn; all of which was done with the full knowledge and consent of said city of La Grande, and without any objections being made by said city, and at great expense to this plaintiff; that, in about the year 1897, this plaintiff, with the consent of said city of La Grande, and at considerable expense, constructed a sub-was held that, while mere adverse possession, for the statutory period, of a public highway, could not confer title thereto, the fact that such possession was accompanied with other circumstances which would render it inequitable for the public to assert its right to such highway would, upon the principle of estoppel, protect one so encroaching, against the assertion of its right by the public, "in order to prevent manifest wrong and injustice." The court illustrated this by stating that where a party, under an honest conviction of right, had taken possession of a portion of a highway "and expended his money in erecting buildings thereon, without interference on the part of the public, these, or, perhaps, other, circumstances, connected with adverse possession for the statutory period, may afford good ground for estoppel."

This language was quoted, and the controlling principle of the foregoing case applied, in South Bound R. Co. v. Burton, 67 S. C. 515, 46 S. E. 340, in which an injunction was refused to restrain abutting owners who had encroached upon the line of a street from prosecuting actions to obtain compensation for the depreciation of the value of their property, resulting from the construction and operation of a railroad through such street, even though a portion of such owner's claim against the railroad company was based upon the increased injury to their property, arising from their encroachment upon the street.

It is difficult to determine from the Iowa decisions just what is regarded by the supreme court of that state as the determining factor in cases calling for the application of the doctrine under discussion, whether it be estoppel on the part of the municipality, or adverse possession on the part of the adjoining owner. Thus, in Davies v. Huebner, 45 Iowa, 574, it was said: "There are cases where the nonuser [of a highway] has continued for such a length of time, and private rights of such a character have been acquired by long continued adverse possession, and the consequent transfer of lands by purchase and sale, that justice demands the public should be estopped from asserting the right to open the highway. The first requisite to establish such estoppel should be that the adverse possession should continue for ten years, by analogy to the statute of limitations. Then it should be shown that there was a total abandonment of the road for at least the period of ten years." Applying this principle, it was held that, where a portion of the highway had been fenced in and cultivated for more than ten years, and there had been an entire nonuser by the public of that portion for nearly thirty years, and one of the adjoining owners had built his dwelling house so that part of it was within that portion of the highway, the public should be estopped from claiming any right to such portion. It was also held, as to another portion of the same highway, which was also claimed by an adjoining owner, that, inasmuch as it had been inclosed but a short time, the right of the public thereto had not been impaired. But upon the latter portion no improvements seem to have been made, the opinion being silent in that regard.

And in Crismon v. Deck, 84 Iowa, 344, 51 N. W. 55, in which it appeared that the owner of land adjoining a highway had built a house and barn, set out a hedge and fruit trees, dug a well, and made other improvements with reference to the line of his land upon the road as established by a survey duly made, and remained in open and undisputed possession of the land to such line for more than ten years, and such line was, during all that time, recognized by the public as the true line of the road, it was held that an injunction would lie to restrain the road supervisor from removing such of these improvements as were found to be in the highway by a subsequent survey. This opinion well illustrates the difficulty of determining just what the Iowa court, as before intimated, would deem the controlling factor of its decision, since it further appeared that the purpose of the authorities in removing such improvements was to grade the portion of the road upon which the trees stood, and which was bordered by the hedge, and to stantial sidewalk along the north side of her said lots 4 and 5 and up against her said iron fence the entire length of said lots on what was supposed to be the south side of said O street, and that said sidewalk is now there in good condition for use, and that subsequently she extended her said sidewalk along the north end of lot 3 and on the south side of O street, and that the sidewalk so extended is now there in good condition for use as a sidewalk and that no part of said sidewalk is dangerous or in need of repairs; that said O street of said city of La Grande, as platted by said Daniel Chaplin, runs east and west along the north side of plaintiff's said premises, and, if any part thereof is inside of plaintiff's said fence, such part has never been opened for public use, and has been inclosed and improved by the plaintiff and her grantors with the full knowledge and consent of said city of La Grande, and without any objections being made thereto, ever since the fall of 1891; that the said dwelling house of plaintiff is worth not less than $3,000, and the north side of said dwelling house is within about 16 feet of said iron fence above set out, and the whole architectural effect of said dwelling house and premises would be destroyed if said fence were removed 7 feet or any other distance south of its present location, and all of the improvements on said premises, including said dwelling house, were made by the plaintiff and her grantors with the full knowledge of the city of La Grande; that she and her said grantors believed and dig a shallow ditch on the side of the road next to such owner's land, and the court thought that no ditch was required, and that the trees should not be removed as long as they did not obstruct the road, nor prevent its necessary improvement. The court also seemed to have been influenced in its decision by the fact that, if the line of the road should be relocated as the road supervisor intended, the value of the improvements would be seriously impaired.

But in Waterloo v. Union Mill Co. 72 Iowa, 437, 34 N. W. 197, in which it appeared that the street in question had been occupied in part by an adjoining owner with a mill race for a period of ten years under a claim of right, it was held that the city was not estopped to abate the mill race as a nuisance. The court said: "Had the city or the public, were that possible, induced or encouraged the defendant's grantor to construct the race, this would constitute an element of estoppel. But the race was constructed without right, though under claim of right and in reliance thereon. The claim of right fails. The city, representing the public, has lost no right by delay in bringing this action to restore the street to the public use. . . . Defendant cannot interpose the statute of limitations, and surely delay in pursuing a remedy against it does not estop the city."

And in Bigelow v. Ritter (Iowa) 108 N. W. 218, it was held that the county authorities were not estopped from removing a fence erected upon a public highway by an adjoining owner merely because of the erection of such fence thirty-five years before, and the planting of a willow hedge on the bank of a stream which flowed through the portion of the highway fenced in. In this case the court declared that title to a portion of the highway could not be acquired against the public by adverse possession alone. "The public may be estopped by its conduct, but the statute of limitations will not run against the sovereign or its agencies."

In Cincinnati v. Evans, 5 Ohio St. 594, it was held that an adjoining property owner had a right to remain undisturbed in a building claimed by a city to be within a street, and that the city authorities had no right to remove or destroy it in a summary manner, where it appeared that such owner had in good faith erected the same upon the apparent and reputed line of the street as it was shown him by the city surveyor when he began to build, and that he had from that time and during a period of more than twenty-one years continued in the uninterrupted, exclusive, and adverse possession of the ground upon which it was located. The court adopted the conclusions of an earlier case, Cincinnati v. First Presby. Church, 8 Ohio, 298, 32 Am. Dec. 718, that the statute of limitations would apply to municipal corporations in the same manner and to the same extent as to natural persons, and, as a consequence, that notorious and uninterrupted possession, by a private individual under a claim of right, of land dedicated to a city for streets for more than twenty-one years, would bar the claim of the city to its use. This case, standing alone, would, of course, be without the scope of this note. But in Lane v. Kennedy, 13 Ohio St. 42, the court, in distinguishing the case at bar from other cases, made use of the following language: "Nor is it like the case of Cincinnati v. Evans, supra, where the purpose of the possession and intended permanency were indicated by the erection, within the bounds of the street, of the front of a large and costly warehouse. The erection of such a building in such a place was ample notice to the city authorities that he [the abutting owner] thereby intended a permanent appropriation to his private and individual benefit of a portion of the public easement, and called for immediate and effective measures upon their part to prevent it. The case was, in this view of it, rightly determined; but, as will be seen by a reference to the facts therein stated, it might with equal, if not greater, propriety, have been placed upon the ground of an estoppel in pais on the part of the city authorities; the building having been located by the city surveyor and upon lines previously estab-

claimed that the north line of said premises was where said iron fence is now located." It is then alleged that on December 12, 1904, the defendant, as street superintendent, wrongfully and erroneously claiming that plaintiff's fence and sidewalk were 7 feet in the street, notified her to remove the same, and that if she did not do so within twenty-four hours he was directed by the city to remove it; that, if such fence and sidewalk are moved back to what is claimed by defendant to be the street line, they would be wholly on plaintiff's property and 6 or 7 feet south of her north line, and her shrubbery and shade trees would be destroyed to her irreparable damage and injury; "that, by reason of the facts above alleged, the defendant, as street superintendent of said city of La Grande, and his successors in office, ought to be and they are estopped and precluded from claiming now or at any time, or proving or alleging, that any of the lands included within the plaintiff's said fence are or ever were any part of said O street, and from asserting or exercising any supposed right to remove the plaintiff's said iron fence or her said sidewalk onto her said lands, or in any manner to remove either said fence or said sidewalk from where they are now located, or to interfere with them, or either of them, in any way, or to open or widen said O street so as to include within said street any part of the lands which are inclosed within her said fence as aforesaid." The relief demanded is an injunction restraining the defendant and his successors in office lished and built upon." In the case at bar it was held that title by adverse possession was not established merely by the erection of a fence inclosing a portion of a public highway not then used or required for the public travel, and its maintenance for upward of twenty-one years without any objection on the part of the authorities, upon the ground that there was nothing in the character of the fence which indicated an intention permanently to appropriate the land; but the decision is not placed upon the insignificant value of the fence, and, apart from the language used in distinguishing the Evans Case, does not notice the doctrine of equitable estoppel.

The theory upon which those decisions proceed which seek to apply the doctrine of equitable estoppel to municipal corporations in the matter of highways has been strongly criticized by Elliott on Roads & Streets, § 884, where it is doubted "if the doctrine of these cases can be sustained upon principle, —at least where the city or the local authorities have done no affirmative act to mislead the claimant. It is difficult to conceive upon what principle an equitable estoppel can be securely placed in such cases, for the person who encroaches upon a public way must know, as a matter of law, that the way belongs to the public, that the local authorities can neither directly nor indirectly alien the way, and that they cannot divert it to a private use. As the person who uses the highway must possess this knowledge, and in legal contemplation does possess it, one of the chief elements of an estoppel is absent. An estoppel cannot exist where the knowledge of both parties is equal and nothing is done by the one to mislead the other. In addition to this consideration, may be noted another influential one, . . . and that is, the private use of the public way was wrong in the beginning and wrong each day in its continuance, and it is a strange perversion of principle to declare that one who bases his claim on an original and continued wrong may successfully appeal to equity to sanction and establish such a claim. It is, at all events, a great stretch of the doctrine of estoppel and 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) a wide departure from the rule laid down by the earlier decisions and confirmed by the modern authorities."

This position finds strong support in two Alabama cases: In Webb v. Demopolis, 95 Ala. 116, 21 L.R.A. 62, 13 So. 289, the court doubted that the private use of a public highway, even when of a character subversive of its use by the public as a thoroughfare, could ever be perpetrated by the invocation of the doctrine of estoppel in pais against the municipality in which the highway lay. To quote from the opinion: "It would seem, on principle, that, inasmuch as the municipality has no alienable right in such highway,—none which could be lost through its laches, or through actual private possession under a claim of exclusive right,—but holds the locus in quo not only for itself and for its own citizens, but in trust for the public at large, whose rights therein are in no wise dependent upon anything the municipality may do or omit to do, that nothing done or omitted by a city in the way of allowing, or even inducing, persons to make erections on a street which obstruct and interfere with its use could or ought to estop the public to have such obstructions removed, or to have them removed at the suit of their trustee and agent, the municipal corporation. . . . And, if it were necessary to pass on the point in the present case, we should be much inclined to hold that no act or omission to act, on the part of the municipality, with reference to obstructions in public streets, could in any case raise up an estoppel against it to proceed in the interest of the public to have such obstructions removed, however long they had been allowed to remain in the street."

And in Harn v. Dadeville, 100 Ala. 199, 14 So. 9, which was a bill in equity by a town to have a dwelling house and fence removed which obstructed a street, relief was granted upon the ground that, as against the right of the municipality to its streets, neither nonuser, nor the rule of prescription, nor the statute of limitations, could be invoked to prevent its successful assertion.

from interfering with the plaintiff's fence and sidewalk, shade trees, shrubbery, etc., and for a decree establishing her north line at the point where such fence is now located. The court below, on motion of defendant, struck out all that portion of the complaint which we have inclosed in quotation marks, and plaintiff declined to amend or plead further. The defendant answered, setting up that plaintiff's fence and sidewalk were 7 feet in the street and was an unlawful obstruction thereto, and that the defendant had been ordered by the city to remove such obstruction. These allegations were denied by the reply. When the case came on for trial the plaintiff declined to offer any testimony, and, after hearing that of the defendant, the court rendered a decree dismissing the complaint, and plaintiff appeals.

cation of the doctrine of equitable estoppel under such circumstances is found in Wolfe v. Sullivan, 133 Ind. 331, 32 N. E. 1017, which was an action by a city to abate a nuisance by encroachment upon the line of a street. It appeared that the street had been used by the public ever since the town had been laid out; that it was dedicated to the public use by the original plat of the town, duly recorded; that the fence which was claimed to be in the street line had been there for forty years; that no part of the land on the inside of the fence had ever been used by the public as a highway; that the fence had been built by the owners of the abutting property in good faith in the belief that they were the owners in fee of the land on the inside thereof, and that the public had no interest therein; that a brick sidewalk had been constructed along such fence without any objection from the city or its officers; and that shade trees had been set out with reference to the fence. It also appeared that other property owners on the same side of the street, under the same circumstances and belief, had built permanent improvements, consisting of fences, shops, stables, barns, and out buildings, all of which were made with the full knowledge of the city and its officers without any objection on their part; that said improvements were made in good faith and in the belief that the public had no rights in the land used therefor; and that the strip had never been accepted as a highway, but had been wholly abandoned by the public. The court held that these facts were not sufficient to constitute an estoppel, upon the grounds that, when the facts were equally known or accessible to both parties, there could be no estoppel in pais, and that any loss sustained by the property owners by reason of the abatement of the obstructions in the street was due to their neglect, and the neglect of those through whom they claimed, to ascertain the true line of the street before making such improvements. The court said: "The common-law maxim is, 'Once a highway, always a highway.' Highways belong to the public, and are under the control of the sovereign, either immediately, or through local governmental instrumentalities. The right of the public to the use of the highways is not barred by the statute of limitations. No one can acquire a right to the adverse use of a legally established highway, . . . no matter how long such use may continue, for each day's user is a nuisance. . . . There can be no such thing as a permanent, rightful, private possession of a public street."

Where the public has never exercised control, or has long withheld the assertion of its control, so that private parties have been induced to believe that a street has been abandoned, and on the faith thereof, and with the acquiescence of the public's representatives, have made structures or improvements on such abandoned street, or on their own land, in a situation where they must suffer great pecuniary losses if the public representatives are allowed to allege non-abandonment of the street, the doctrine of equitable estoppel applies.

These principles had already been asserted by the same court in an earlier case, Sims v. Frankfort, 79 Ind. 446, where Judge Elliott, in rendering the opinion of the court, used the following language: "It appears that both parties had at least equal opportunities of knowledge. The facts were as fully known to the appellant and his grantor as to the municipality. There was not ignorance on one part and knowledge on the other; there was certainly knowledge on the part of the appellant. The recorded plat was to him constructive knowledge of the limits of the street. So, too, were the boundaries of his own lot. There could not in such a case be a reliance upon the acts of the municipal authorities. Where both parties meet upon equal terms and possess the same opportunities of knowledge, and there is neither a false statement nor a fraudulent concealment, there can be no equitable estoppel." In this case it was held that mere possession of a part of a street for the statutory period of limitation, by an abutting property owner, would not confer title, and in arriving at this conclusion, it was reasoned that, inasmuch as a municipal corporation had no right to divest the rights of the public in highways, it could not invest an intruder with title thereto by mere permissive neglect. Yet the learned justice seems to admit that there might arise such circumstances as would call for an application of the doctrine of estoppel, for he goes on to say: "Whatever may be the rule where it appears that great expenditures have been made and acts done for which compensation cannot be fully made, it is plain that, where there has been a small expenditure of money for which full compensation can readily be made, title cannot be acquired in a public highway by estoppel. But back of this lies the fundamental doctrine that the municipal corporation has no power to sell or barter away the public streets, and, of course, no right to surrender them to a mere license. What it cannot alien for a full consideration, it cannot bestow as a mere gratuity."

And some of the earlier Indiana cases go far to support the proposition that a municipality might, by the conduct of its officers, be estopped to assert control over a portion of a highway appropriated by an abutting owner. For example, in Brooks v. Riding, 46 Ind. 15, though it was held that a city would not be estopped to establish the true line of a street merely by the fact that the authorities had permitted an abutting owner to occupy a small portion of the street not then needed by the public, the following language is found: "Where the lines of a street have been practically established by the occupancy and improvements of the lots bordering upon it, and the city authorities have recognized the correctness of the lines so established by permitting the owners to so occupy and improve their property, and have acquiesced in it for a considerable length of time, and to such an extent that to change the lines would work great wrong to the owners and disturb long-established lines and possession, the city or public authorities would undoubtedly be estopped from disturbing the lines so practically established, although an accurate survey should show that they were wrong according to the plat, and that the lots as occupied extended into the street as originally established."

trine of estoppel because the structure which was sought to be removed as an encroachment upon a city street was of a temporary character and of no great value; and denied that the statute of limitations could affect the city as to its rights to its streets as trustee of the public.—it nevertheless admitted that there might be instances in which, through nonuser by the public, private rights might have grown up therein which the city would be estopped to deny.

Again, in Hamilton v. State, 106 Ind. 361, 7 N. E. 9, it was held that the public would be estopped to assert its right to a highway by means of criminal prosecutions against adjoining landowners for obstructing it, where it appeared that the highway in question had been maintained for more than twenty years, and the landowners had, in good faith and on the appearance of things, constructed fences along the supposed line. The court said that in such a case the presumption of abandonment would be indulged, and would be conclusive, when to disturb long-established lines would involve criminal consequences, or work serious injury to valuable improvements made in good faith; and added that, while the statute of limitations alone would not bar the right of the public to use a highway, yet, if by nonuser such appearances were created as would induce an adjoining owner to do acts which would indicate that in good faith he claimed as his own that which was in fact a part of the highway, and expended money on the faith of his claim by adjusting his property to the highway as he supposed or claimed it to be, the public would be estopped.

The application of this doctrine under such circumstances as are now under consideration seems also to be denied in New Jersey, since, in Tainter v. Morristown, 19 N. J. Eq. 46, where it was held that an adverse possession of twenty-seven years would not legalize an encroachment upon a highway, the court uttered the following significant words: "To protect highways from en-encroachments, that it is the business of no one to resist, requires that the public be allowed to resume its rights at any distance of time, disregarding any loss to those who have appropriated and erected improvements on the public domain, or to the more innocent purchasers from them."

The same rule appears to obtain in Pennsylvania, for in Com. v. Moorehead, 118 Pa. 344, 4 Am. St. Rep. 599, 12 Atl. 424, in which the defendant was indicted for maintaining a common nuisance, which consisted in the erection and maintenance of a building upon a borough street, it was held that no title could be acquired against, or lost to, the public, by nonuser alone; and that public rights could not be destroyed by long-continued encroachment or permissive trespasses. In the language of the opinion: "The public is not deprived of its rights by encroachment. Buildings erected on public grounds or on highways acquire no right on account of time or expenditures." See also Com. v. McDonald, 16 Serg. & R. 390; Com. v. Bowman, 3 Pa. St. 202.

And in Kopf v. Utter, 101 Pa. 27, which was an action of trespass against the authorities of a certain borough for entering upon the plaintiff's premises and moving his front fence back from the street in accordance with what the defendants claimed to be the true line of the street in which the plaintiff's lot was located, and in which judgment was rendered for the defendants, though the trial court instructed the jury that, if the municipal authorities did anything to induce the plaintiff, or those under whom he held, to build up to the line claimed by him, the municipality, after twenty-one years, would be estopped from afterwards disputing it, the supreme court, in affirming the judgment, said: "In this instruction the plaintiff certainly got all and probably more than he was entitled to."

Bean, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence does not accompany the transcript, and the only question for our consideration is whether the court erred in striking out the matter pleaded in the com-cases wherein justice requires that an equitable estoppel shall be asserted against the public shall form a law unto themselves, is found in Vicksburg v. Marshall, 59 Miss. 563, where it appeared that an abutting property owner whose land lay upon a hill extending into a street removed the fence to the bottom of such hill and into the street, handsomely terraced his grounds, and adorned them with shrubbery and rare plants. It also appeared that the city street commissioner undertook to straighten the street by digging down part of these embankments, but was enjoined by the owner's agent, and that they compromised by the commissioner agreeing to cut down only a portion of the hill and to permit the owner to build in the street a brick wall and steps leading to his property. This agreement was, however, not ratified by the city, which insisted upon cutting away such part of the wall and hill and improvements as was necessary to straighten the street. It further appeared that the survey made by the city placed the line more to one side than the line which had been recognized by other persons building on the street, so that, if the street was run according to the city's survey, it would take property and improvements occupied by many proprietors upon that side of the street. The court held that, the streets being held by the city in trust for the public, adverse possession thereof by an abutting owner could not bar the right of the public to have the street opened, and that therefore the obstructions in the street beyond the line generally recognized should be removed. But it failed to carry this principle to its logical conclusion, and, though it thought "the probability" to be that the line established by the city's survey was the correct one, because it was shown that the other line had been to a considerable extent recognized as the true line by persons building on the street, it deemed it "possible" that plaint as an estoppel. From these averments it appears, in brief, that Chaplin's addition to La Grande was laid out and platted in 1884, and O street thereon dedicated to the public. The street, however, was never opened or improved by the city, and it never assumed authority or control over it until the fall of 1904. In 1891 the plaintiff's grantor bought lots 4, 5 and 6, in block 74, abutting on O street, and, with the consent and knowledge of the city, built a fence along what he claimed and believed to be the north line of such property, erected a large dwelling house on lot 5 with reference to such supposed line, and planted shade trees and shrubbery and otherwise improved the property for a residence site, claiming in good faith to be the owner of the same. In 1897, after the plaintiff had purchased the property, she constructed an iron fence at the place where the former fence stood, and afterward hauled earth and filled up the lot to such fence, and otherwise improved the property by planting shade and ornamental trees along the fence, making a rose garden inside of the inclosure near the fence, building a sidewalk just outside the fence, and otherwise improving the property at great cost, all of which was done in good faith with the consent and knowledge of the city authorities and under the belief that she owned the property so inclosed. Several years before the commencement of this suit she blasted out and excavated a part of lot 3 at great cost, and constructed a barn thereon, leaving sufficient room between it and the supposed street line for a driveway. The plaintiff's dwelling house is within 16 feet of the iron fence and the architectural effect thereof and the beauty and value of her home would be materially impaired if the fence is now removed, and her approach to her barn would be entirely cut off. The occupancy and improvement of the property as to these persons the city was estopped to deny the correctness of that line. It therefore gave the property owner the benefit of claiming that line to be the true line, and enjoined the city from removing anything beyond that line.

Not only is the law upon this subject in a state of confusion, but even the court itself sometimes becomes confused, and in the same opinion will deny the application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel to municipalities in language broad enough to cover all cases, while admitting that there still might be cases where justice and right should require that the public be estopped to assert its right to an unused portion of the highway. A very good illustration of this confusion of mind may be found in the opinion in Ralston v. Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 76 Am. St. Rep. 834, 33 S. E. 326, in which it was held that an abutting property owner could not acquire title to a portion of a public highway by a mere occupation of the same for a much longer period of time than that required by the statute of limitations, upon the ground that such occupation, being by the mere sufferance and permission of the municipal authorities, was, for that reason, insufficient to establish title by adverse possession. The court, however, met the issues raised by the contention that municipalities might, by the lapse of time and the laches of their officers, lose control of public highways; and attempted to "fearlessly settle them for the public good." It was of the opinion that "the only logical conclusion that can possibly be reached is that the public easement in all the highways of the state, wherever situated, is sacred from individual encroachment, and all interference therewith, by private interests, is a continuing public nuisance, subject to abatement whenever the growing necessities of the people require such easement for the uses to which the land to which it attaches was originally 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

dedicated. . . . Nor does the doctrine of estoppel apply in such cases. . . . The statute of limitations is a mere legal estoppel, and, if not applying to legalize a public nuisance, neither does equitable estoppel; for equity follows the law, and will grant no relief to a lawbreaker or wrongdoer." Those passages from Judge Dillon, quoted in OLIVER v. SYNHORST (and, indeed, in nearly every case where this question is discussed), were criticized in the following language: "In this the rights of the people are confounded with the rights of the municipality. How can equitable estoppel, any more than the statute of limitations, deprive a sovereign of his rights, and permit his subjects to destroy them by their wrongful conduct. The use of their highways is a sovereign right, common to all the people, and of which they cannot be divested, except in accordance with their will and appointment for the public weal." In this connection, Webb v. Demopolis, 95 Ala. 116, 21 L.R.A. 62, 13 So. 289, was cited to the effect that neither the acquiescence of a city "in an obstruction or private use of a street by a citizen, nor laches in resorting to legal remedies to remove it, nor the statute of limitations, nor the doctrine of equitable estoppel, nor prescription, can defeat the right of a city to maintain a suit in equity to remove the obstruction." From such sweeping language the inference would be irresistible that this court surely meant to deny that the public could ever be estopped to assert its rights to highways, were it not for further statements made almost in the same breath with the above citation. "There may arise cases of particular hardship, where, through the negligence or mistake of the public officers, valuable and permanent improvements, under a bona fide claim of right, may be erected by the abutting lot owners, invading and destroying, without wrongful intent, the public easement in a portion of the adjacent street.

as referred to was made by the plaintiff and her grantor under the belief that the true north line is where the iron fence is now located and with the knowledge and consent of the city authorities. It thus appears that for more than thirteen years the plaintiff and her grantor have been in the open, exclusive, and peaceable possession of the strip of land now in controversy, and that they have made, without objection from the city authorities, valuable and permanent improvements thereon in good faith, believing that they were the owners thereof. The question for decision is whether, by reason of these facts, the city is now estopped to assert that the true street line is other than where the plaintiff's fence is located.

There is irreconcilable conflict in the cases as to whether the right of the public to use land dedicated for a street or highway may be extinguished by nonuser or adverse possession, due to the laches, negligence, or nonaction of municipal authorities. The weight of the adjudged cases seems to be that since such authorities have no right to sell, alienate, or dispose of the highways, except as provided by law, the statute of limitations will not run against them; and such is the rule now in force in this state by a recent statute. Or. Laws 1895, p. 57. The authorities on the question are so fully collated and commented upon in Orr v. O'Brien, 77 Iowa, 253, 14 Am. St. Rep. 278, 42 N. W. 183, and Northern P. R. Co. v. Ely, 25 Wash. 384, 54 L.R.A. 526, 87 Am. St. Rep. 775, 65 Pac. 555, that a mere reference to them is all that is essential in this connection. But, while the rule may be that the ordinary statute of limitations as such cannot be set up to defeat the right of the public to the use of a street or highway, there may grow up, in consequence of the laches of the public authorities, private rights of more persuasive force in the particular case than that of the public, and, if

"acts are done by an adjoining proprietor which indicate that he is in good faith claiming as his own that which is in fact a part of the highway, and is expending money on the faith of his claim, by adjusting his property to the highway as he supposes or claims it to be, the public will be estopped." Hamilton v. State, 106 Ind. 361, 7 N. E. 9; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Joliet, 79 Ill. 25; Piatt County v. Goodell, 97 Ill. 84; Baldwin v. Trimble, 85 Md. 396, 36 L.R.A. 489, 37 Atl. 176; Paine Lumber Co. v. Oshkosh, 89 Wis. 449, 61 N. W. 1108. Although Mr. Dillon is unwilling to assent to the doctrine that, as respects public rights, municipal corporations are within the ordinary limitation statutes, he says: "It will, perhaps, be found that cases sometimes arise of such a character that justice requires that an equitable estoppel shall be asserted even against the public; but, if so, such cases will form a law unto themselves, and do not fall within the legal operation of limitation enactments," and that "there is no danger in recognizing the principle of an estoppel in pais as applicable to exceptional cases, since this leaves the courts to decide the question, not by the mere lapse of time, but upon all the circumstances of the case to hold the public estopped or not, as right and justice may require." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 675.

This principle was applied by this court in Schooling v. Harrisburg, 42 Or. 494, 71 Pac. 605. May and Nixon had laid out an addition to the town of Harrisburg, and duly acknowledged and recorded a plat thereof in 1871. At that time the tract of land was inclosed with a fence which was thereafter maintained. None of the streets or alleys shown were opened except a portion of one street, although the proprietors sold lots with reference to the plat. Notwithstanding the making and recording of the plat dedicating the streets and alleys to the public,

Such mistakes are often occasioned by different surveyors, with different instruments. Such invasion is sometimes slight in comparison with the improvements made, and at other times it is much more serious, not only destroying the public easement, but interfering with the regularity and symmetry of the street. To abate such structures as an ordinary nuisance would be a tyrannical act of governmental power. . . . The mistake having been mutual, or occasioned by the negligence of the public, and the property owner being free from evil intent, the loss should fall on the people, as most able to bear it, rather than on the individual, who may be rendered bankrupt if he must endure it." Such cases were considered to be within the protection of that provision of the Constitution which forbids private property to be taken or damaged for public use 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

without compensation. "Whenever private property is taken or damaged for public use, it must be done through the public officers, acting as the agents of the people. And for these same officers to mislead, either by acts of omission or commission, a private person into building a costly structure over the line of a public highway, in the belief that he was within the limits of his own property, and then demolish or remove it as a public nuisance, would be taking and magaging private property for public use without just compensation. Hence, to regain the use of the highway lost in this manner, they must do so under the right of eminent domain. . . . Such exception does not apply to one who knowingly invaded a highway. He must bear the loss occasioned thereby, and not the public. It is his own injury, and he must endure it alone."

Nixon continued to occupy and cultivate one of the streets and subsequently sold the lots abutting thereon and conveyed his interest in the street. His grantee occupied and cultivated the street and erected a shed to his barn extending out over an alley. It was held that upon these facts the municipal authorities were estopped from opening the street because of their laches in permitting Nixon and his grantee to improve the same as a part of their premises. This case is decisive of the one at bar. Indeed, the facts call more strongly in the present case for the application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel than in the Schooling Case. In that case Nixon and his grantee knew that the land occupied by them had been dedicated to the public, and acted with full knowledge of that fact. Here, on the contrary, the plaintiff and her grantor supposed and believed that the portion of the street occupied by them was a part of their property and was included within the boundaries of their lots. Again, in the Schooling Case the opening of the street would not have seriously injured the plaintiff, while here the removal of the fence to what the defendant claims to be the true street line would, according to the allegations of the complaint, practically destroy the plaintiff's property for residence purposes and would work irreparable injury to her. She has, with the knowledge and consent of the city authorities, inclosed a part of the street and improved the same in good faith to such an extent that (if the allegations of the complaint are true) she would be seriously injured and damaged if she is now required to remove her fence and throw open that portion of the street occupied by her to the public, and is therefore entitled to invoke, as against the city, the doctrine of estoppel.

The decree of the court below will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the motion to strike out, and for such further proceedings as may be right and proper.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

v.

SECURITY TRUST & LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(— Tenn. —, 96 S. W. 499.)

Insurance—accruing premium—notice.

1. Where for eight years an insurance company has permitted an assignee of a policy to pay the annual premium by notes falling due quarterly, and has always notified him when a note was falling due, the policy cannot be forfeited for nonpayment of a note, unless the customary notice reached him.

Same—undelivered letter.

2. The mere mailing of a notice properly addressed and stamped is not, in the absence of a statute or contract provision, a compliance with a custom to give notice of the maturing of a note given for an insurance premium, where the letter never reaches its destination, although the custom has been to give notice by mail.

Same—payment after notice.

3. The duty of an insured promptly to pay his premiums is complied with in case, through miscarriage of the mail, a customary notice of the maturity of a premium does not reach him, if, upon subsequently receiving notice, he promptly pays the premium due.

Same—premium note—suspension of liability.

4. Under a clause in a note given for an insurance premium, that "for any loss occurring by death after this note is due and

Case Note.—Necessity that notice of maturity of premiums or assessments sent through the mail be received:—The cases bearing upon the question whether it is necessary, in order that a cancellation or forfeiture clause may become operative, that notice of the maturity of a premium or assessment which has been sent through the mail be received, may be divided into three groups: First, those in which the manner of giving notice is regulated by statute; second, those in which the matter is governed by contract provisions; and, third, those in which, as in the case in hand, no requirement is imposed on the insurer as to the way in which notice of maturity is to be given other than may result from the customary course of dealing between the parties.

In cases of the first group, the question whether it is necessary to show receipt of notice sent through the mail is obviously a matter of statutory construction.

In Iowa, under a statute providing that written notice of the maturity of a premium note "may be served . . . by registered letter addressed to the insured, . . . and no policy of insurance shall be suspended for nonpayment of such amount until thirty days after such notice has been served," it has been held that the service is complete when the registered letter is mailed, and not when it is received by the addressee (McKenna v. State Ins. Co. 73 Iowa, 453, 35 N. W. 519); and that such service is complete at the time the letter, properly addressed, is registered, and not when, by due course of mail, it reaches the office of its destination (Ross v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 83 Iowa, 586, 50 N. W. 47).

By a New York statute it is provided that no policy of insurance can be declared forfeited or lapsed by reason of nonpayment of any premium when due, unless a written or remains unpaid then said company shall not be liable," the policy is not forfeited by failure to make prompt payment, but the liability of the insurer is merely suspended during the default, permitting the insured by payment to restore the liability.

(May 19, 1906.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Chancery Court for Shelby County in defendant's favor in a suit to compel the restoration and payment of an insurance policy. Reversed.

Statement by Neil, J.:

The defendants issued a policy July 9, 1897, on the life of J. M. Bowen in the sum of $5,000. This was assigned August 9, printed notice stating the amount of such premium due on such policy, the place where it should be paid, and the person to whom the same is payable, shall be duly addressed and mailed to the person whose life is insured. Under such statute, the fact that the notice is not received by the insured is immaterial (McConnell v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. 34 C. C. A. 663, 92 Fed. 769); although evidence of the nonreceipt is admissible to rebut the presumption raised by an affidavit that such notice was mailed (Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Nixon, 28 C. C. A. 620, 48 U. S. App. 482, 81 Fed. 796).

The deposit in the postoffice of a notice duly stamped and properly addressed will, by virtue of the above statute, operate as full notice to the insured of its contents whether he ever received it or not. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Scott, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 541, 57 S. W. 677.

But such notice, to be effective, must be properly addressed (Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Frommhold, 75 Ill. App. 43); and the statute is not complied with by sending notice to an unauthorized address; in which case the insurer is held to take the risk of actual delivery (Carter v. Brooklyn L. Ins. Co. 110 N. Y. 15, 17 N. E. 396).

And, where the insured had given notice of change of address, there can be no presumption that notice sent to the old address was received. Goodwin v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Asso. 97 Iowa, 226, 32 L.R.A. 473, 59 Am. St. Rep. 411, 66 N. W. 157.

In cases of the second group, the question whether mailing of a notice is sufficient depends upon the construction to be given to the contract of the parties as to the manner in which notice is to be given.

In Duffy v. Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. (N. C.) ante, 238, 55 S. E. 79, it is said: "The authorities are practically uniform in holding that a by-law of an assessment insurance company, providing that notice may be given members of assessments by mailing, properly addressed, is valid and binding upon the members."

Where a policy provided that "thirty days' notice before payment is due, except 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1897, to complainants, L. T. and W. K. Kavanaugh, to secure a debt due them from Bowen. There was an agreement, which was known to the company, that the complainants were to pay the premiums. The premium was $223, payable annually, on July 15th, but an agreement was made with the company that the complainants should pay on that day $55.75, and should give notes each for a like amount, maturing at three six and nine months. From 1897 to 1905 this plan was followed by both parties; notes being made payable at the Memphis National Bank, Memphis, Tennessee, and all notes were paid until the present controversy arose.

July 2, 1904, the defendant company notified the complainants that the premium of when monthly payments are made, will be mailed to the insured from the home office to the last known address as it appears upon the books of the company. Failure to make any payment at the home office on or before the day when due, whether the insured does or does not receive such notice, hereby cancels this contract and releases the company and the insured from any further liability,"—it was held to be incumbent on the company to mail the notice to the last-known address of the insured, but that if it did so it was not responsible for his failure to receive it. Denver L. Ins. Co. v. Crane, 19 Colo. App. 191, 73 Pac. 875.

In Protection L. Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 81 Ill. 88, it was said that, where it was agreed in the policy that a written or printed notice of assessment, directed to the address of the assured as it appeared on the books of the company and deposited in the postoffice, or delivered by an agent of the company, or printed in a newspaper published by the company and forwarded as aforesaid, should be deemed legal notice, the intention was to provide for the mode of service, and not that these acts, except a delivery by an agent, should be accepted as notice.

The foregoing case was distinguished in Weakly v. Northwestern Benev. & Mut. Aid Asso. 19 Ill. App. 327, in which it was held that, where a by-law of a mutual insurance company provided that the secretary should cause notice of assessment to be sent to the last known postoffice address of every member, and that every member failing to pay his assessment within thirty days from the date of such assessment should stand suspended, the duty of the company was complete by mailing the notice of assessment; and that the failure of such assessment to reach the assured by reason of its miscarriage in the mail or the absence of the assured would not excuse nonpayment of the assessment within the prescribed time.

And in Union Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Miller, 26 Ill. App. 230, it was held that, where the by-laws of a mutual insurance association provided that the secretary should give notice of assessment and of annual dues, $223 would be due July 15th. Complainants replied: "Referring to your letter of the 2d, in reference to the Bowen policy, would like to ask if it would be agreeable to you for my brother and myself to pay this premium as heretofore; that is, one fourth cash and three notes at three, six, and nine months for the balance. If so, kindly forward the three notes, and my brother and I will sign same and return with check for the first payment." This was signed by L. T. Kavanaugh. The company replied: "We have yours of the 6th in re premium due on the Bowen policy, and it will be agreeable to us to accept one fourth cash and three notes for balance, which notes are herewith inclosed for signature." Upon receiving the notes the company wrote: "We have received from Mr.

W. K. Kavanaugh check for $55.75 and three notes properly signed, in settlement of the premium on the Bowen policy, for which we hand you official receipt herewith." This receipt, after stating the number of the policy and amount of the premium and date of its maturity, continued: "Received the above-noted premium, payable in terms of the policy." The three notes were each for $55.75, and matured October 15, 1904, January 15, and April 15, 1905. They were made payable at Atlanta, Georgia. This fact was overlooked by the complainant, who rested under the belief that they were payable, as all the others for the previous seven years had been, at the Memphis bank above referred to. The previous premiums had been paid to the agent in charge of the Nashville "sending all such notices by mail to the last given postoffice address of each member, which shall be considered a legal notice," notice sent by mail was binding upon the assured, although not in fact received.

In Northwestern Traveling Men's Asso. v. Schauss, 51 Ill. App. 78, Affirmed in 148 Ill. 304, 35 N. E. 747, a constitutional provision of the association that, "upon receiving notice of an assessment, it is the duty of every member to remit the amount promptly to the treasurer of the association. A notice sent to the last address given shall be considered a legal notification,"—was construed as meaning that a notice sent by mail to the last given address of the member, allowing a reasonable and usual time for it to reach its addressed destination by due course of mail, would constitute a sufficient and legal notification, and would be considered as having been received by the member at the expiration of such time.

Where, by a policy of insurance, it was provided, relative to notice of assessment, that, "should the party whose life is hereby insured reside out of New Orleans, then he shall be notified by written notice deposited in the postoffice in the city of New Orleans, addressed to such address as has been left in writing at the office of the association with the secretary,"—the mailing of such notice was sufficient, although it was never received by the assured. Epstein v. Mutual Aid & Benev. L. Ins. Asso. 28 La. Ann. 938.

A by-law of a mutual insurance company which provided that the policy should become void "of the assured should neglect for the term of thirty days to pay his premium note or any assessment thereon when requested to do so by mail or otherwise" was construed, in Lothrop v. Greenfield Stock & Mut. F. Ins. Co. 2 Allen, 82, as imposing upon the insurer only the duty of placing a notice in the postoffice, duly directed to the assured.

Where the charter of an insurance company required that the member should be notified by the secretary or otherwise, either by a circular or a verbal notice, of assessments, actual notice of the fact of the as-essment is required, and the mere mailing of the notice is not sufficient. Castner v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 50 Mich. 273, 15 N. W. 452.

In Forse v. Supreme Lodge, K. of H. 41 Mo. App. 106, it was held that, where a by-law of a benefit society provided that notices of assessment should be "promptly delivered to each member, or deposited in the mails by the reporter, directed to the member at his last or usual place of residence or business," it was not necessary that such notice, when duly mailed, should be received, in order to be binding upon the member.

In Survick v. Valley Mut. Life Asso. (Va.) 23 S. E. 223, it was held that where a by-law of a mutual insurance company provided that any member failing to pay his pro rata assessment within thirty days from notification in person or from date of mailing same to his address would forfeit his rights in the association, the mailing of such notice was sufficient to bind the assured, and its failure to reach him by reason of miscarriage in the mail would not excuse the nonpayment of the assessment within the time prescribed.

Where the by-laws of a beneficial association expressly provided that the mailing of the official paper containing the notice of any assessment should constitute a sufficient service of such notice, and such by-laws were a part of the contract of the parties, a service of a notice of the assessment by mail is sufficient and effective. Modern Woodmen v. Tevis, 54 C. C. A. 293, 117 Fed. 369.

But where the by-laws provide that notice of assessment may be mailed to or left at the last-known postoffice address or residence of a member, or handed to him in person; and, when so mailed or delivered, it shall be a legal and sufficient notice to the member,"—a notice sent through the mail to an erroneous address, and never received, is insufficient. Waterworth v. American Order of Druids, 164 Mass. 574, 42 N. E. 106.

Where the constitution of a mutual benefit association requires notice of assessment office. The latter transaction was with the general agents of the company at the Atlanta office, Aaron Haas & Son, to whom the cash and notes were transmitted.

On October 8, 1904, Aaron Haas & Son deposited in the mail at Atlanta, Georgia, postage prepaid, a letter addressed to complainants at Memphis, Tennessee, advising them of the maturity of the premium note falling due October 15, 1904. This letter was not received by the complainants, and for that reason the note was not paid. It had been the custom of business between the complainants and the defendant during the preceding seven years that the defendant should notify the complainants of the maturity of notes several days before the falling due thereof, and the complainants had relied upon this custom, and had always paid promptly upon receiving the notice. The note not having been paid at maturity, Aaron Haas & Son, on October 24, 1904, addressed a letter to the complainants, calling their attention to the fact, and adding: "As it was not paid when due, it will now be necessary for remittance to be accomto be given to members by "mailing them a notice to their last address as shown by the branch book," a notice sent to a different address is inoperative unless actually received. Molloy v. Supreme Council, C. M. B. A. 93 Iowa, 504, 61 N. W. 928.

And in Supreme Lodge, K. of H. v. Dalberg, 37 Ill. App. 145, Affirmed in 138 Ill. 508, 28 N. E. 785, it was held that, where the laws of a benevolent society provide for the giving notice of assessment either by delivery of the notice, or by mailing the same to each member at his last or usual place of residence or business, evidence showing only that notice was mailed to a member, it not appearing where the notice was sent, or that it was ever received by the member, is insufficient to establish a forfeiture for nonpayment of assessments.

In considering cases falling within the third group, it becomes necessary to make a further subdivision, taking, first, those cases where the giving of notice in some manner not specified is required either by contract provision (which includes provisions by constitution or by-law of mutual benefit associations), or by operation of law, as is the case where the insurance is forfeited by failure to pay an assessment within a certain time after it becomes "due," notice and demand then being considered essential to mature the assessment; and, second, those cases where no notice is required, except as the necessity may arise, as in the case in hand, from a custom prevailing between the parties.

Where a law or contract mentions notice, without any qualification, personal notice is meant. Stewart v. Supreme Council, A. L. of H. 36 Mo. App. 319; Railway Pass. & Freight Conductors' Mut. Aid & Ben. Asso. v. Loomis, 43 Ill. App. 599, Reversed on another point in 142 Ill. 560, 32 N. E. 424; Benedict v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 48 Minn. 471, 51 N. W. 371; Northwestern Traveling Men's Asso. v. Schauss, 148 Ill. 304, 35 N. E. 747. See also cases, infra.

But in Stewart v. Supreme Council, A. L. of H. supra, it was held that, where the by-laws of a benevolent society require the notification of every member liable to an assessment, though ordinarily such provision would be interpreted as requiring personal notice, yet the word "notify" might be given a different meaning by uniform usage of a society with which all its members are familiar; and that, where there was evidence of a custom of mailing notices of assessment, it was a question for the jury whether personal notice had not been dispensed with.

Where service of notice by mail is not authorized, an insurer using the mail to convey notice takes the risk that the notice shall reach the assured. Merriman v. Keystone Mut. Ben. Asso. 138 N. Y. 116, 33 N. E. 738.

It has been held that, where there is no provision as to the manner in which notice shall be given, it is sufficient for the insurer to show that a notice was mailed, and, in the absence of countervailing proof, it will be presumed that the notice reached the policy holder to whom it was addressed. Merriman v. Keystone Mut. Ben. Asso. supra; Bettenhasser v. Templars of Liberty, 58 App. Div. 61, 68 N. Y. Supp. 505; Benedict v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. supra.

Where the articles of association provide that the treasurer shall notify members of assessments, and they shall pay the same within thirty days after receiving such notice, personal or actual notice is necessary; and the mailing of a notice duly stamped and addressed is only evidence of its receipt, the burden of proof being upon the sender to show that it was actually received. Schmidt v. German Mut. Ins. Co. 4 Ind. App. 340, 30 N. E. 939.

So, also, in Courtney v. United States Masonic Ben. Asso. (Iowa) 53 N. W. 238, it was held that, where it was provided that payment of assessments must be made within thirty days from date of notice on penalty of forfeiture, actual notice was necessary; and that, although a notice sent through the mail actually reached the residence of the assured, but was not opened in consequence of his serious illness, which terminated fatally, it was insufficient.

In Continental F. Ins. Co. v. Adams, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 269, it was held that, where the insurance policy made no definite designation as to the manner or place of payment, and the agent informed the insured when the contract was made that before he would be required to pay the various annual instalments of premium he would receive a notice from the company designating the person to whom the payment should be made panied by a health certificate signed by the assured, Mr. Bowen, the same subject to our company's approval." A blank certificate was inclosed. To this letter the complainants on October 27th replied through L. T. Kavanaugh as follows:

Gentlemen:—

I am in receipt of your favor of the 24th, with health certificate inclosed. I have had no notice whatever of this note. As they have formerly been sent to the Memphis National Bank, Memphis, where they are made payable, I had overlooked the matter entirely. I hardly think it fair of you to have allowed this matter to go on without giving me some notice, but I herewith inclose you my check for the amount, with interest at 6 per cent from July 15th, and will ask that you mail me receipt. I have tried to locate Mr. Bowen, the insured, but I understand he is out of the city, but, under the circumstances, think you should accept this without the health certificate. However, I will have the certificate properly signed as soon as possible, and forward same to you. In future kindly send these notes here for collection, and they will be promptly paid.

Awaiting your prompt reply, I am,

Yours truly,

[Signed] L. T. Kavanaugh.

P. S. I heard to-day that Mr. Bowen is in New Orleans, and have written but have no definite address. I understand he is in good health. Please return receipt and oblige

Yours truly,

To this letter Aaron Haas & Son replied, insisting upon a health certificate. Referring to the place of payment of the note, they said: "This particular note was not payable in Memphis, but in Atlanta, and on October 8th we wrote you notifying you that it would fall due on the 15th. So we did all that we should have done, under the circumstances." Complainants at once set about to get the certificate of health required, and, being ignorant of the whereabouts of Mr. Bowen, only succeeded in getting a certificate from him on the 13th day of November, 1904, and then for the first time they became acquainted with the fact that he had had a stroke of paralysis in the preceding spring. Complainants at once set the certificate to Aaron Haas & Son, with letters explaining the facts, and this was referred by them to the New York office. After some correspondence the defendant company declared the policy forfeited because of the failure to pay at maturity the note above referred to, due October 15, 1904.

As already stated, complainants promptly tendered payment of the note due October 15, 1904, as soon as they received notice and at what place, the mere act of the insurer in posting notice through the mail did not operate as notice.

In Robbins v. American Mut. Aid Soc. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 580, it was held that, where a contract of insurance was construable as requiring notice of the maturity of premiums in order to enforce a forfeiture for their nonpayment, no forfeiture would be declared under such a contract unless the notice was actually received by the assured; and that the mailing of the notice properly addressed and stamped was not sufficient.

So, where the constitution of a mutual insurance order required that the financier of the local organization should "notify all persons of the assessments and when in arrears for dues," the mere mailing of a notice of assessment addressed to the member cannot be deemed a compliance with such requirement. Crockett v. Order of Red Cross, 24 Ohio C. C. 421.

Where the lodge rules of a mutual benefit association require notice to be given by the secretary to members in arrears for dues, for nonpayment of which within a certain time thereafter members would be dropped, actual notice to the member must be shown. Odd Fellows' Protective Asso. v. Hook, 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 89.

Where the by-laws of a mutual insurance company require that "notice of such contributions shall be sent to each; and every member failing to pay such contributions within thirty days from date of notice shall forfeit his or her claim to any and all benefits of the association;" and the manner of sending such notice is not prescribed,—actual notice must be given, and the mere sending of a notice by mail, unless it was received, will not work a forfeiture. McCorkle v. Texas Benev. Asso. 71 Tex. 149, 8 S. W. 516.

Though the constitution and by-laws of a mutual benefit society are silent on the subject of notice, and contain nothing dispensing with notice, but provide for the dropping of members who may neglect or refuse to pay an assessment for the period of thirty days from date of such assessment, before the association can complain of the neglect or refusal by a member to pay he must be given notice, and such notice must be personal. A notice mailed, but not received, is ineffective. Railway Pass. & Freight Conductors' Mut. Aid & Ben. Asso. v. Loomis, 43 Ill. App. 599, Reversed on another point in 142 Ill. 560, 32 N. E. 424.

Where the contract of insurance contained no provision as to the giving notice of maturity of premiums, but a custom of giving personal notice had prevailed, it was held in Grant v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. 76 Ga. 575, that such practice should be kept up, or notice of substitution for it of notice by mail be given to the insured.

from the company. They subsequently tendered the amount of the note due January 15, 1905, and this was likewise refused. Thereupon the original bill in this case was filed, in the lifetime of Bowen. In this bill the complainants insisted that the policy had not been forfeited, but was merely suspended during the time the note remained unpaid, according to its terms, and sought an injunction restraining the defendant from asserting that the policy had become void or was in any wise forfeited. Pending these proceedings Bowen died, and thereupon an amended bill was filed, claiming a recovery upon the policy and also a penalty under the statute.

The policy contains the following provision:

"Nonforfeitures—That if any payment on this policy be not made when due, this policy shall lapse and be ipso facto null and void. But, if full premiums on this policy be paid as already provided, for not less than three complete years, and the policy thereafter lapse, it can be surrendered within six months from the date of the lapse, for the amount of nonparticipating paid-up insurance stated in the following table, subject to the conditions of this policy, except as as to payment of premiums.

"That if the full premiums on this policy be paid as already provided for not less than five complete years at the option of the insured, it can be surrendered within six months from the date of lapse for the amount of cash stated in the following table"—setting out table.

The note due October 15, 1904, reads as follows:

July 15, 1904.

Three months after date we promise to pay to the order of the Security Trust & Life Ins. Co. $55.75, with interest at 6 per cent, for value received, at Atlanta, Ga., hereby agreeing and admitting that this note is given as an extension of time for the payment of the premium, or part thereof, maturing this day on their policy on my life, but is not to be payment of said premium, or any part thereof, in any sense, nor is the same given or accepted as such, unless this note is paid at or before maturity.

This note is given said company upon this express understanding or agreement, that for any loss occurring by death after this note is due and remains unpaid, then said company shall not be liable.

[Signed] L. T. Kavanaugh,
W. K. Kavanaugh.

The chancellor dismissed the bill, and complainants have appealed and assigned errors.

Neil, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. In Hartford L. Ins. Co. v. Hyde, 101 Tenn. 396, 404, 405, 48 S. W. 968, the court quoted as laying down the proper rule the following from Joyce on Insurance, vol. 2, § 132, viz.: "If a life insurance company has been in the practice of notifying the insured of the time when the premium will fall due, and of the amount, and the custom has been so uniform and so reasonably long in continuance as to induce the assured to believe that a clause for forfeiture for nonpayment will not be insisted on, but that the notice will precede the insistence upon the forfeiture, and the insured is, in consequence, put off his guard, such notice must be given, and, if not given, no advantage can be taken of any default in payment which it has thus encouraged; for the insured is entitled to expect the customary notification, and to mislead the insured by not giving such notice, and then insist upon a strict compliance with the conditions of forfeiture, constitutes, under such circumstances, a fraud upon the assured which the courts have refused in numerous cases to countenance,"—citing *Helme v. In Mayer v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 38 Iowa, 309, 18 Am. Rep. 38, the underlying reason is thus stated: "Every law should be reasonable, and it is reasonable only when it is adapted to human conduct. Courts should not so administer the law as to require of individuals a course of conduct which, to a majority of reasonable and right-minded men, is unusual and unnatural. Indeed, it would be impossible long to maintain a law which is at variance with the judgment and sense of justice of a majority of those upon whom it operates. Now, it must strike every reasonable mind that a majority of ordinarily prudent persons, who had been customarily notified of the time when premiums upon their policies became due, and who had received no notice of an intention to abandon the customary course would, in a particular case, expect and await a like notice. And, if such is the reasonable and natural result of the previous dealings of the company, it must govern its future conduct so as to accord with the reasonable expectation thus created; that is, having furnished a policy holder reasonable ground for expecting that he will be advised when his premium becomes due, the company must continue to give such notice until it furnishes the assured notice that he need no longer expect it. Any other construction would make the law a trap to insure the unwary."

In the absence of a statute, or of an express term in a contract, making sufficient the mere mailing of a communication containing information of the approaching maturity of the premium, it must appear that such communication was received before it can be operative as notice, and thereby effect a forfeiture of the policy upon failure to pay at the day. *Brattleboro East Soc. v. We shall now refer more particularly to some of the foregoing authorities.

In Brattleboro East Soc. v. Reed it was held that notice of an assessment, sent by mail pursuant to a condition for a forfeiture in case of nonpayment after six months' notice, ran not from the time when the notice was deposited in the postoffice, but from the time when the party received it.

In Continental F. Ins. Co. v. Adams it was held that the mere act of posting notice through the mail did not operate as notice to the insured.

In Protection L. Ins. Co. v. Palmer it appeared that the policy provided the assured should, within thirty days from the date of notice, pay to the company the assessment, collection costs, and annual dues, and a failure to do so should render it null and void and of no effect. It was held that the provision concerning thirty days' notice meant from the day notice was received by the party to whom it was sent, and not from the day on which it was dated or mailed.

In Castner v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. it appeared that it was provided by the charter of the mutual company that its members should be "notified by the secretary, or otherwise, either by circular or a verbal notice," of assessments made upon them, and, if payment was not made within sixty days, the insurance should be suspended. Notice was mailed in this case June 3d. The fire occurred October 5th. Plaintiff claimed that notice was not received until some time in September. It was admitted that within sixty days of its receipt a tender of the amount due upon the assessment was made and refused. It was held that the policy was not liable to suspension until the expiration of the specified time after notice was received.

In Burhans v. Corey (not an insurance case, but germane upon the subject of notice by mail) it was held that the mere mailing of notice was not sufficient; that it must have been received. In the opinion of the court it is said: "A party can be in no actual default who proceeds to comply with a notice as soon as he receives it, and to hold him guilty of a constructive default, when he has always been willing to do his duty, can only be allowed where he has consented to run the risk of the safe transmission through a given channel." 17 Mich. 285.

In Mullen v. Dorchester Mut. F. Ins. Co. it appeared that there was a notice of assessment sent to a policy holder by mail, but not received by him. The directors of the company afterwards voted to cancel all policies the holders of which had not paid the assessment, and notice of such cancellation was sent to the policy holder by mail, but was not received. It was held there was no forfeiture.

In Wachtel v. Noah Widows' & Orphans' Benev. Soc. 84 N. Y. 31, 38 Am. Rep. 479, it was held: "In the absence of any agreement by the member or any provision in the charter or by-laws for a different mode of service, it should be made personally, as required at common law, where the object is to deprive a party of his rights or property; or, if that can be dispensed with, then in such other mode as will be most likely to effect its object."

In McCorkle v. Texas Benev. Asso. it appeared that there was a by-law that required notice of assessment to be sent to each member, and this by-law provided that "any person who shall fall in arrears for dues or contributions after thirty days' notice shall cease to be in good standing, and shall forfeit all rights and claims to any and all benefits of the association." It was the custom of the officer charged with the duty to mail such notice to each member. It was held that a reasonable construction of the by-laws required that notice should be in fact given to a member before a forfeiture would result from a failure to pay dues, etc., and that mailing to a member through the postoffice was not such notice. Referring to the case of Castner v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra, the court said: "The rule laid down by the Michigan court, we think, is fair and just to both parties, and should be followed. To deprive a person of his property rights without any notice is contrary to reason, and such a claim should not be enforced by the courts unless the terms of the contract plainly require it."

In United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Mueller it was held that, where the by-laws of the association contained the provision that "payments are to be made . . . within thirty days of the date of the notice thereof," this meant from the date of the service of the notice, and not from the date of the writing; and in Cronin v. Supreme Council, R. L. it was held that, when the by-laws of a beneficial association provided that payments of assessments should be made within thirty days from the date of the notice, a member was not in default until thirty days from the time notice is received.

the question was whether the notice of the cancellation of a policy of insurance would date from the mailing of the policies or from the actual reception of the notice. Speaking on this subject, the court said: "It is contended by the defendants that the mailing of the policies with a letter stating the object sufficed to cancel them, because it was equivalent to the acceptance of a proposition by mail; and the following cases are cited, among others, in support of the position: Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 307, 93 Am. Dec. 511; Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441; Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103, 21 Am. Dec. 262; Brisban v. Boyd, 4 Paige, 17. These were cases of contracting wholly by letter or telegram. It was long ago held that, if an offer made by mail is accepted by mail, the contract is complete from the moment the letter of acceptance is mailed, even if it is never received. Vassar v. Camp, supra. Those cases have no application here, because no negotiation was pending, and no contract was proposed. The plaintiff did not make any offer to the insurance companies that might or might not be accepted. It sought to do an act that would be binding on the companies, whether they were willing or not. That act was a surrender of the policies with the request that they be terminated, and the act could not be complete until the request reached the companies or their agent. The policies and notice might have been sent by a messenger, who would have been the agent of the plaintiff for that purpose. Having been sent by mail, it was none the less the agency of the plaintiff than if a messenger had been selected. It was necessary for the plaintiff, in order to terminate the policies, to have its notice actually reach the companies or their representative and the instrument selected for that purpose was the agent of the plaintiff, not of the defendant. If the plaintiff lost control of the letter as soon as it was mailed, that fact has no bearing except upon the nature of its relation to the agent that it empowered to deliver the package. It seems, however, that the writer of a letter may withdraw it from the office in which it is deposited, or from the office to which it is sent. United States Postal Laws & Regulations, §§ 531, 533. If the letter never reached the companies, they would not have been bound, or, if it reached them after a long delay, they would have been bound only from the date of receipt. So far as the delivery of such a letter is concerned, the law does not recognize the agency of the mail as of any higher or more binding character than that of an express company or a private individual, although it may presume that a letter duly mailed was received by the person to whom it was properly addressed." 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In State v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. it was held that delivery of a letter or package containing several premiums on a life policy, to a postoffice or carrier within this state, addressed to the company at a point outside of the state, did not constitute delivery or payment of such renewal premium to the insurance company within the state; and that such delivery and payment did not become complete and effective until actual receipt of the premiums by the company at its office; and that the money remained in the meantime at the risk of the sender.

It is insisted that the contrary rule is laid down in the following authorities: 2 May, Ins. § 356a; Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 381; Lothrop v. Greenfield Stock & Mut. F. Ins. Co. 2 Allen, 82; Survick v. Valley Mut. Life Asso. (Va.) 23 S. E. 223; McKenna v. State Ins. Co. 73 Iowa, 453, 35 N. W. 519; Epstein v. Mutual Aid & Benev. Life Ins. Asso. 28 La. Ann. 938; McConnell v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. 34 C. C. A. 663, 92 Fed. 769; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Eggleston, 96 U. S. 573, 24 L. ed. 843; Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Doster, 106 U. S. 30, 27 L. ed. 765, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18; Hartford L. Ins. Co. v. Hyde, 101 Tenn. 403, 48 S. W. 968; Otis v. Payne, 86 Tenn. 663, 8 S. W. 848.

In the section referred to in May on Insurance, it is said: "In regard to the effect of a habit or usage of sending notice of the date when each premium becomes due, opinions differ. On the one hand, it is held that where, from the course of dealing between the parties, the insured has a right to believe that notice will be given to him of the amount due and the time it is to be paid, the company cannot, in the absence of such notice, set up the failure to pay. Usage makes the giving of notice a part of the contract. If, where there is a usage to give notice, none is sent, payment of the premium within a reasonable time will save forfeiture." Further along in the same section, it is said: "A failure of notice to pay a premium to reach the assured does not prevent the avoidance of the policy if the notice was properly mailed and directed,"—citing Lothrop v. Greenfield Stock & Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra. "So, under the Iowa statute, requiring notice to be given to the makers of premium notes when they fall due, the service is complete on mailing a registered letter, or at least when it should be received in due course of mail,"—citing McKenna v. State Ins. Co. supra.

In Lothrop v. Greenfield Stock & Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra, it appeared that the policy which controlled the matter contained a provision that, "if the assured should neglect for the term of thirty days to pay his premium note, or any assessment thereon, when requested to do so, by mail or otherwise," etc.

In McKenna v. State Ins. Co. the court had under consideration a statute which provided that "such notice may be served either personally or by registered letter addressed to the assured at his postoffice address named in or on the policy," etc.

In Survick v. Valley Mut. Life Asso. it appeared that the by-laws of the defendant company provided that any member failing to pay his pro rata assessment within thirty days from notification in person, "or from date of mailing same to his address," should forfeit," etc. The decision of the court was placed expressly upon the provision as to mailing.

So, in Epstein v. Mutual Aid & Benev. Life Ins. Asso. the decision was based upon the ground that the policy provided that the insured should "be notified by written notice deposited in the postoffice in the city of New Orleans, addressed to such address as has been left in writing at the office of the association with the secretary."

McConnell v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. was also based on a statute providing for notice by mail.

The case of New York L. Ins. Co. v. Eggleston does not sustain the defendant's contention. It is true that the circuit judge charged the jury that, if the notice was mailed within such time as the insured would in due course of mail have received it, then he should be held to have received it. This portion of the charge, however, was not drawn in question or considered by the supreme court; but a previous portion inclosed in brackets which treated of the custom to give notice. In addition, the court, at the close of the opinion, adverted in pointed terms to the fact that the insured had never received any notice. There was evidence that notice had been mailed, and also evidence that it had not been received. In the case of Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Doster there is some language in the opinion, used in an incidental way, supporting the defendant's contention here; but in the later case of Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. v. Hamlin, 139 U. S. 204, 35 L. ed. 170, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614, the same justice suggested a doubt of the correctness of that view, in the following language: "Whether the clause in the certificate of insurance relating to notice means anything more than that proof of mailing a notice according to the defendant's usual course of business, directed to the insured at his postoffice address as appearing upon its books, made a prima facie case of compliance upon its part with the terms of the contract, leaving the insured to prove, in order to prevent a forfeiture of his membership, that the notice was not in fact received by or for him, we need not determine."

The passage cited from Bacon on Benefit Society and Life Insurance is based on cases dealing with contracts which, by their terms, provided that notice might be given by mail.

In the case of Hartford L. Ins. Co. v. Hyde, supra, it is true the charge of the circuit judge contained the expression that the assured was not bound to pay "until such notice was mailed;" but no point was made upon that feature of the charge, and the mind of this court was not directed at all to the subject, and it was not dealt with in the opinion. That case is therefore not authority for defendant's contention.

Nor is the case of Otis v. Payne applicable. In that case the court had under examination a negotiation conducted by mail. Such a case stands on a rule different from the one we now have before us. 1 Page, Contr. § 52. And see Pennsylvania Lumbermen's Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Meyer, 61 C. C. A. 254, 126 Fed. 352. Here we have not a negotiation, but a claim that a right already acquired was forfeited by miscarriage of the mail; that the mere posting of a letter properly stamped and addressed should be treated as notice and a valuable right thereby defeated, although such letter never reached its destination, no information was conveyed by it, and it in no sense performed the purpose it was designed to perform.

Before such a conclusion can be properly reached, it seems to us there should be direct statutory provisions requiring it, or the clear terms of a contract.

The purpose of a letter is to give information. If it never reaches its destination, it fails of its purpose. To say that nevertheless it must be held to have accomplished the purpose could only be justified, as we have said, by the terms of a statute or of an express contract authorizing such result. In the absence of these, it would not be reasonable to infer that a man would agree that his ignorance of a fact should fix him with all of the consequences of knowledge.

It is said in the present case that the custom had been to give notice by mail, and that, when a letter was properly posted, all of the requisites of the custom were complied with. This is not a sound view. All of the previous letters had reached their destination, and had conveyed the information they were designed to convey. The custom was not merely to mail, but to give notice by mail, to actually convey the information intended to be delivered by that means.

We see no hardship to the insurer in this view of the matter. It is surely not admissible to suppose that any insurance company is alert for occasions to declare forfeitures and thereby to keep moneys for which no equivalent has been rendered. The company is entitled to prompt payment of premiums. It is only by such payments that its business can be carried on. The power to declare forfeitures for nonpayment is given to effectuate this purpose. But it is a perversion of the purpose when forfeitures are in themselves made an object or end to be attained. Therefore the courts have always seized upon every reasonable circumstance presented in a case to prevent the taking effect of a forfeiture. In the case of a miscarriage of the mail, the insured performs his duty if, upon subsequently receiving notice, he promptly complies by paying the premium due. Grant v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. 76 Ga. 583. The complainants in the present case did so comply and thereby saved the forfeiture.

2. Aside from the question just considered, and passing without special remark the peculiarity of the policy, in that it places the provision for forfeiture for nonpayment of premiums under the misleading head of "nonforfeitures," we are of opinion that, under a proper construction of the policy considered in connection with the language of the notes and the correspondence at the time, it was intended that the rights of the parties should be measured by the provision embodied in the notes, the last sentence of which contained a summation of the agreement of the parties under the new phase it had assumed. A portion of the premium had been paid in cash, and notes executed for the residue, which were enforceable by the company. This clause reads: "This note is given said company upon this express understanding or agreement, that for any loss occurring by death after this note is due and remains unpaid, then said company shall not be liable." The effect of this was that, if the complainants permitted this note to go to maturity and remain thereafter unpaid, they took the risk of the death of the insured, Bowen, thereafter and pending such default. The rights of the parties were reciprocal. The defendant had the right to collect and thus restore the insurance, and the complainants the right to pay, with the same result. But in the meantime the advantage was with the company in one aspect, since, if Bowen had died while the note still remained unpaid, the insurance would have been lost.

The foregoing seems the most reasonable construction, since under no other can full effect be given to the words "and remains unpaid."

Even if we did not deem this construction the best, still, if a reasonable one, we should feel bound to adopt it, when considering whether a forfeiture should be allowed, since, when dealing purely with the question of forfeiture, "the rule is that, if policies of insurance contain inconsistent provisions, or are so framed as to be fairly open to construction, that view should be adopted, if possible, which will sustain rather than forfeit the contract." McMaster v. New York L. Ins. Co. 183 U. S. 25, 46 L. ed. 64, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10. And see Traders' Ins. Co. v. Dobbins, 114 Tenn. 233, 234, 86 S. W. 383; Schmidt v. German Mut. Ins. Co. 4 Ind. App. 340, 30 N. E. 939; Burkhard v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 102 Pa. 262, 48 Am. Rep. 205.

For cases construing fairly similar clauses, substantially as herein construed, see Equitable Ins. Co. v. Harvey, 98 Tenn. 636, 639, 40 S. W. 1092; Williams v. Albany City Ins. Co. 19 Mich. 451, 2 Am. Rep. 95; Hooker v. Continental Ins. Co. 69 Neb. 754, 96 N. W. 663; Houston v. Farmers' & M. Ins. Co. 64 Neb. 138, 89 N. W. 635; Robinson v. Continental Ins. Ins. Co. v. Perky, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 698, 24 S. W. 1080. And see American Ins. Co. v. Klink, 65 Mo. 78.

Ressler v. Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. 110 Tenn. 411, 75 S. W. 735, is not in conflict with what we have herein decided.

No loss occurred by the death of Bowen, while the note was in default. That event did not occur until a considerable time after complainants had made a full tender of the amount due upon the notes. Hence there was no forfeiture.

It results that the decree of the chancellor denying complainants relief was erroneous, and must be reversed, and judgment must be rendered here for the amount of the policy and interest. The points decided being decisive of the case, we need not consider the other points raised by the facts set forth in the statement and argued in the briefs of counsel.

We do not think this is a proper case for the imposition of the statutory penalty upon insurance companies for the interposition of frivolous defenses.

Petition for rehearing denied.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

RE PHILLIP LUEFT, JR., et al.

(— Wis. —, 109 N. W. 652.)

Trust—power to mortgage.

1. The executors have power to mort-

Case Note.—Power of trustee to mortgage trust estate for purpose of making im-gage the trust estate under a will placing an estate in their hands in trust to use the income for the maintenance of testator's son, for the accomplishment of which purpose they are given power to manage the property, sell land, or convey the whole or any part thereof as the testator might himself do, where, without the mortgage, the income does not exceed the necessary expenses of maintaining the estate, while, by means of it, sufficient to maintain the son will be secured.

provements so as to render it productive:

—In determining the question stated, the inquiry must be whether the granting of such power to the trustees was within the intention of the creator of the trust, as indicated by express provisions, or implied, as in the case in hand, from the purposes for which the trust was created. Its solution in any given case, therefore, will depend upon the peculiar circumstances.

(1) In Starr v. Moulton, 97 Ill. 525, it was held that, where it was clear that executors had power under the will to sell such portions of the real estate as they might deem proper for the purpose of paying debts, removing encumbrances, or improving the remainder with the view of making it productive; and throughout the will expressions occurred which tended to show that it was the intention and expectation of the testator that his executors would keep his estate intact so far as they were able, and generally to manage it in such a way as to make it as productive as possible,—the grant of power to sell included the power to mortgage when that mode of raising money would, in the judgment of the executors, be to the best interest of the estate,—especially where they were expressly clothed with discretionary power to sell unproductive property, or to convert it into productive property by making improvements thereon when justified by the condition of the estate.

In Wetmore v. Holsman, 23 How. Pr. 202, 14 Abb. Pr. 311, it was held that, where trustees under a marriage settlement are expressly authorized to repair, improve, and to borrow money, they are clearly authorized to borrow money by mortgage to improve the estate.

In Baillie v. Carolina Interstate Bldg. & L. Assn. 100 Ga. 20, 28 S. E. 274, it was held that, where a trustee under a settlement for the benefit of a married woman during her life, with remainder over to her children, was authorized to pledge, mortgage, sell, and convey a sufficiency of the trust property to make up any deficiency in the income, with power, for the purpose of managing said trust estate and changing the investments thereof, to pledge, mortgage, sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of all or any portion of the estate, real and personal, as he might deem best, taking into consideration the powers conferred and the nature of the property in question, it was clearly necessary, in order to carry out the inten-

Mortgage—infant's interest.

2. The interests of an infant remainderman will be promoted by an execution of a mortgage to take up a valid prior one and pay overdue taxes, within the meaning of a statute permitting the mortgaging of estates in which infants are interested to promote their interests in the property.

Same—duty of life tenant—effect.

3. The duty of the life tenant to pay taxes on the estate does not prevent the court from authorizing the mortgage of the tion of the grantor, that the power to borrow money for the improvement of the property should exist, and that such power might be exercised by subscribing to stock in, for the purpose of obtaining a loan from, a building and loan association.

In Boon v. Hall, 76 App. Div. 520, 78 N. Y. Supp. 557, it was held that, where property, chiefly unimproved, was devised in trust for the use, benefit, and maintenance of testator's son, who was in dependent circumstances, during his life, with remainder to his heirs, it being apparent that it was the testator's purpose to insure an income to his son, a trustee who was vested with discretionary authority to lease, mortgage, or sell any of the trust property might execute a mortgage to secure advances for the purpose of constructing stores upon the property.

In Schulting v. Schulting, 41 N. J. Eq. 130, 3 Atl. 526, it was held that, where testator manifestly did not contemplate the mortgaging of any part of the estate, but, on the contrary, there was evidence of an intention that the executors should avoid risks in the management of his property, a power of sale vested in them will be construed as authorizing a mortgage, where it is necessary for the preservation of the estate, but not where the object is improvement merely.

Where no specific authority is given to mortgage property, and the exercise of such a power cannot be reasonably implied, a mortgage of trust property for the purpose of obtaining money for the improvement of other real estate subject to the trust is invalid; but the mortgagee may assert an equitable claim against the property improved, to the extent of the benefits thereby conferred upon the cestuis que trust. Tyson v. Latrobe, 42 Md. 325.

An analogous question is presented in the case of Miller v. Redwine, 75 Ga. 130, in which it was held that, where a trustee was appointed by will to hold certain property, consisting of the lease on a hotel, the furniture contained therein, and all the live stock about said hotel, bequeathed to the trustee's wife and her children, the trustee being given the right to sell said property and reinvest the same for the benefit of the cestuis que trust at any time without an order of the court for that purpose, the trustee had power to mortgage the trust property to raise money to carry on the hotel business.

estate to pay overdue taxes, and thereby preserve it for infant remainder-men.

Same—unauthorized act of trustee.

4. Whether or not executors exceeded their power with reference to the income of a trust estate placed in their hands is immaterial in a proceeding to mortgage the interests of infant remainder-men to take up a valid mortgage placed by them on the estate and to pay overdue taxes.

A PPEAL by Flora Annie Lueft by guardian from an order of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County granting leave to mortgage an estate in which she had an interest. Affirmed.

Statement by Siebecker, J.:

An appeal from an order of the circuit court authorizing a referee to mortgage lands in which a minor has an interest under a will. On February 17, 1895, Phillip Lueft, a resident of Milwaukee, died intestate. His will was admitted to probate April 5, 1895. The executors named in the will duly qualified, and letters testamentary issued to them, and they continued to act as executors and trustees during the continuance of the trust under the will. The will of Phillip Lueft, deceased, gave $20,000 out of his personal estate to his son Phillip Lueft, Jr., and then provided as follows.

"All the rest and residue of my estate, real or personal, and wherever situate at the time of my death, I give, devise, and bequeath to my said executors, in trust, however, for the following purposes, to wit: to hold, manage, invest, and reinvest the same, collect the rents, profits and income arising therefrom; to make all necessary repairs, and pay the taxes, assessments and insurance thereon; to lease, sell, deliver, transfer, grant and convey the whole or any part thereof; to invest and reinvest the proceeds of sale, and generally, to have, manage and control my said estate as fully as I might, if living, do myself; all subject, however, to the provisions, conditions, limitations, and restrictions hereinafter contained.

"(A) I direct that during the continuance of this trust, my said executors and trustees shall use the net income arising from the estate hereby devised and bequeathed to them as aforesaid, or so much of said income as may be necessary therefor, for the purpose of properly caring for and maintaining my son William Lueft, and his family, if any; it being my intention that my said son shall, in so far as said net income shall suffice, be maintained in the manner we have heretofore lived, and receive all necessary care, assistance and comforts.

"(B) All personal property herein bequeathed to my said executors and trustees shall be invested, kept invested and reinvested by my said executors and trustees in good interest bearing securities, secured by first mortgage on real estate, situate in the city of Milwaukee, county of Milwaukee, and state of Wisconsin.

"(C) In case my said executors or trustees shall sell any of the real estate hereinbefore devised to them, I direct that the proceeds of such sale or sales shall be invested, kept invested and reinvested by my said executors and trustees in good interest bearing securities secured by first mortgage on real estate situate in the said city of Milwaukee; for the purposes of this will the proceeds of such sales shall be deemed real estate and shall be disposed of by my executors and trustees in the manner hereinafter provided for the disposal of my real estate.

"(D) This trust shall terminate on the death of my said son William Lueft. In the event that on the termination of this trust my said son William Lueft shall leave him surviving lawful issue I will and direct that my said trustees shall convey and pay over all the estate then in their hands to such lawful issue forever."

The will provided, further, that if this son, William Lueft, shall leave no lawful issue, then the executors were to convey and dispose of the estate in their hands as follows: (a) To transfer to his son Phillip Lueft, Jr., all personalty in hand absolutely, and to convey to him all real estate for life with remainder in fee to his lawful issue surviving him, and if he should die leaving no lawful issue then to testator's legal heirs; (b) if the son Phillip Lueft, Jr., should not then be living, to transfer the property to his lawful heirs; and (c) if he should leave no lawful issue, then they were to transfer the estate in their hands to testator's legal heirs. At the time of testator's death his son William was insane, and had been in an asylum for the insane for some seven or eight years. He died September 7, 1901, unmarried and leaving no issue. The son Phillip is married, and at the time of William's death had, and still has, one child, a daughter, Flora Annie, who is a minor. She appears by guardian and prosecutes this appeal.

Testator's estate at the time of his death consisted of personal property amounting to $26,474, and two pieces of real estate,—one piece situated on Twelfth street, appraised at $8,500, and another situated on Wells street, appraised at $5,000. The Twelfth street property consisted of a lot and a half, upon which was located an old brick structure. About five years after testator's death, the executors, by moving the old structure to the rear of the lot and by constructing a new flat building on it, made improvements on the Twelfth street property at a cost of about $36,000, which was paid by applying the legacy to Phillip Lueft, Jr., amounting to $20,000, by using $1,000 of cash on hand belonging to the residue of the estate, and by applying $15,000, raised by a loan on September 18, 1901, by the executors and trustees under the will, payment thereof being secured by a mortgage on the real estate so improved. They also expended $1,500 in improvements on the Wells street property, putting it in proper condition for letting. This action of the executors is alleged to have been taken under the powers of the will, and for the purpose of increasing the income, which was insufficient to pay taxes, assessments, necessary repairs, expenses for the maintenance of the property, and the support, as directed by the will, of the son William. On March 30, 1903, Phillip Lueft, Jr., and his wife, under chapter 300, Laws 1899, petitioned the circuit court to authorize a mortgage of $18,000 on this real estate, the avails of such mortgage to be applied in payment of the $15,000 mortgage given by the executors and trustees and interest due thereon, and to pay the unpaid taxes on the real estate for the years 1900, 1901, and 1902. Notice of such application was given to appellant and her guardian ad litem.

The petition set forth substantially the foregoing facts, and further alleged that the executors, as directed by the will, had supported the son William in an asylum for the insane until the time of his death; that the income from the real estate as so improved was insufficient to so maintain him and pay the expense of administration, the debts, taxes, assessments, and improvements on the real estate; that there was no money of the estate on hand to pay the mortgage when due, and that there were taxes unpaid on the estate for the years of 1900, 1901, and 1902; that a mortgage loan of $18,000 on the property would well promote the interest of the daughter, Flora Annie, prevent the probable foreclosure of the mortgage, pay the former loan of $15,000 with interest, and by redemption of the outstanding tax certificates prevent the issuance of tax deeds on the premises. The court, after a hearing and a reference respecting the application, made an order, based on this petition, in which it found "that the interests of said Flora Annie Lueft, and of any after-born children of said Phillip Lueft, Jr., who will also own and become interested in said real estate under and by said last will and testament of said 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Phillip Lueft, deceased, require and will be substantially promoted by the mortgaging of the real estate mentioned in said petition and hereinafter described for the sum of eighteen thousand ($18,000) dollars, for the reasons set forth in said petition," authorized the execution of a mortgage, and directed the application of the money so borrowed in discharge of the former mortgage and interest due on it and the payment of unpaid taxes. This is an appeal from such order.

Phelan v. Boylan, 25 Wis. 686; Ref. Stat. chap. 136; Schafer v. Luke, 51 Wis. 678, 8 N. W. 857.

Siebeck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under the provisions of the will, it is unquestioned that the executors took the residue of the estate for the purpose of applying the net income thereof, if necessary, to the care and maintenance, during his life, of testator's son William, and of his family, if he had any. In their administration of the trust, for the purposes and in the manner set out in the statement of facts, they mortgaged the real estate for $15,000, to pay in part for the improvements made on it. The inquiry is whether the executors had power so to mortgage the real estate under the powers conferred by the will. The chief difficulty arises in determining whether the power to make disposition of the real estate, given in the will, included the power to mortgage it for the purpose of administering the trust with respect to the care and maintenance of the son William. The decisions on the subject of the right of trustees to mortgage real estate under a simple power of sale are not harmonious. Lardner v. Williams, 98 Wis. 514, 74 N. W. 346. The weight of authority seems to be that a mere power to sell, such as that of a power of attorney to sell real estate, confers no power to mortgage. 1 Jones, Mortg. § 129, and cases cited; 2 Washb. Real Prop. § 1690, and note. But when such powers, coupled with charges upon the estate, are conferred by wills or other instruments, and the executors are intrusted with its management to carry out and discharge such obligations, no such limitation is implied. Under such circumstances, the extent of the power conferred by such words as "to sell," "convey" and their equivalents, is to be ascertained from the intention of the donor of the power in the light of the purposes and objects of the trust as expressed in the grant.

In the construction of powers conferred for such objects, we again find the decisions upon the subject irreconcilable. Some of the courts have adopted the strict construction, and hold that no power to mortgage is implied by the language granting power to sell, convey, and dispose of the real estate, for the reason that such terms negative an intent of the donor to authorize mortgaging the estate. Of this class are the following cases: Bloomer v. Waldron, 3 Hill, 361; Potter v. Hodgman, 81 App. Div. 233, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1056; Price v. Courtney, 87 Mo. 387, 56 Am. Rep. 453; Parkhurst v. Trumbull, 130 Mich. 408, 90 N. W. 25; Greene v. Greene, 19 R. I. 619, 35 L.R.A. 790, 35 Atl. 1042. Other courts adopt a liberal interpretation of such terms when employed in granting such powers, and have construed them as expressly including the authority to mortgage. This rule is followed in Pennsylvania and other jurisdictions. Zane v. Kennedy, 73 Pa. 182; McCreary v. Bomberger, 151 Pa. 323, 31 Am. St. Rep. 760, 24 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Atl. 1066; Jackson v. Everett, 3 Tenn. Cas. 811; Steifel v. Clark, 9 Baxt. 466; Rutherford Land & Improv. Co. v. Santrock, 60 N. J. Eq. 471, 46 Atl. 648; Mills v. Banks, 3 P. Wms. 1; Ball v. Harris, 4 Myl. & C. 264; 4 Kent, Com. 345. This court, in the case of Lardner v. Williams, supra, treating of the question here involved, adopted the rule followed in many jurisdictions of looking into the instrument creating the trust and of giving effect to the manifest intent of the donor as shown by the light of the surrounding circumstances. The principle of this rule is that, if the purpose of the trust can be answered and best accomplished by mortgaging the estate, and if this is not in violation of the intention of the donor, then this method of administration is proper and within the grant of the power. Such construction was followed in Starr v. Moulton, 97 Ill. 525; Faulk v. Dashiell, 62 Tex. 642, 50 Am. Rep. 542; Loebenthal v. Raleigh, 36 N. J. Eq. 169; Waterman v. Baldwin, 68 Iowa, 255, 28 N. W. 435; Kent v. Morrison, 153 Mass. 137, 10 L.R.A. 756, 25 Am. St. Rep. 616, 26 N. E. 427. See also 4 Kent, Com. 345, and cases cited; Perry, Tr. § 768.

The will clearly declares the object of the trust conferred on the executors. They were to employ the residue of the estate transferred to them so that his son William should be cared for and maintained, in the manner in which he had theretofore received "all necessary care, assistance, and comforts;" and the costs thereof was to be defrayed out of the net income of the estate. To accomplish this purpose the executors were vested with the residue of the estate, after a bequest of $20,000 out of the personal estate to his son Phillip, "to hold, manage, invest, and reinvest the same, collect the rents, profits and income arising therefrom; to make all necessary repairs, and pay the taxes, assessments and insurance thereon; to lease, sell, deliver, transfer, grant, and convey the whole or any part thereof; to invest and reinvest the proceeds of sale, and generally, to have, manage and control my said estate as fully as I might, if living, do myself." In its terms and phraseology this language is significant, showing that the testator intended to confer on the executors all necessary authority under the power to manage the property throughout William's life so as to provide for him as the testator had done in his lifetime. It is evident that he intended to invest them with broad and discretionary powers in the control and management of the property, and in the conduct of William's affairs for his benefit. The terminology necessarily implies that the executors were to handle the property in such ways as they found best under the circumstances to meet the charge imposed by the will. The terms of the will and the directions it imposed negative the idea that the executors were to be limited to an absolute sale of the real estate and to reinvesting the proceeds in interest-bearing securities. Testator manifestly contemplated that they should secure the largest possible income from the estate. The accomplishment of such an object implies that they were vested with a discretion to adopt such management as they, in their judgment, found would best attain the desired result. No portion of the will indicates an intention to restrict this authority by limiting the management and the disposition of the property to any specific method.

We should look to all parts of the will to ascertain the testator's intention. Taking this view of the will, we think that the language, "generally, to have, manage and control my said estate as fully as I might, if living, do myself," an expression of testator's intention to confer broad and comprehensive powers for the purposes of this trust, and that it should be construed as intending to give the language of the will a significance inclusive of every meaning in which the words may be used, instead of a restricted one. It appears that the real estate held in trust yielded no income above the necessary expenses of repair, taxes, and insurance. After it was improved, as shown, it yielded a net income sufficient to furnish the son William the care and maintenance directed, and the executors were thus enabled to accomplish the purposes of the trust. In the light of these facts, it seems obvious that the provisions of the will were complied with by the executors in making the improvements, and that their administration was in harmony with the testator's intention that the powers granted them should be coextensive with the purposes of the trust, and included those required to carry out the improvements of the real estate, and for this purpose they had authority to execute the mortgage for $15,000. This mortgage being valid, and there being no means of payment available, it seems obvious that the only way to protect the infant's interest, and to prevent a sale of the premises in satisfaction of this mortgage, is to authorize another loan to secure money to pay it. Such a course is promotive, within the contemplation of chapter 300, p. 525, Laws of 1899, of her interests in the property.

It is suggested that the court erred in directing that the delinquent taxes be paid out of the money so to be raised in this proceeding, because the law imposes the duty of paying them on the life tenant. Notwithstanding such duty of the life tenant, the court may very properly direct redemption 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

from a sale for delinquent taxes to prevent the issuance of tax deeds, thereby protecting the infant's estate. A delay of redemption until payment could be enforced against the life tenant might seriously imperil the infant's interests.

It is urged that the executors exceeded their trust in applying more than the net income to William's support. Whether or not there is a basis for such a claim is immaterial in this proceeding. The executors had power under the will to make the $15,000 mortgage, and it was proper for the court to order a new loan to provide for its payment to protect the infant's estate from loss as threatened if it were not paid.

We discover no error in the record, and find that the order of the circuit court was well founded.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

JOHN W. CLARK, Sheriff.

(— Ga. —, 54 S. E. 1022.)

Arrest—two of same name—error.

1. Where a valid warrant is placed in the hands of an arresting officer, and there are two persons bearing the name appearing in the warrant, the officer must make diligent inquiry as to the person intended to be arrested, and if, after such inquiry, the officer in good faith arrests a person of that name whom he honestly believes to be the person named in the warrant, he will not be liable in an action for false imprisonment founded on the mere fact of arrest, even though the person arrested be innocent of the charge and not the person for whom the warrant issued. If, however, after such arrest, information reaches the officer that a mistake has been made, and the person arrested is not the person for whom the warrant issued, and the officer thereafter detain such person in custody, he will be liable in an action for false imprisonment for such detention.

3. In the trial of an action against an officer for false imprisonment upon the ground that the plaintiff, who bore the name stated in the warrant, was not the person for whom the warrant issued, it is not necessary to the maintenance of the action that it should appear that the officer made the arrest "out of spite" or "a reckless disregard for the rights and liberties of the citizen." In such case, if the officer act in good faith, he is protected; but good faith may be negatived in other ways than by proof of spite or recklessness. The mere want of ordinary care is, in some circumstances, inconsistent with good faith.

ERROR to the City Court of Richmond County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for false imprisonment. Reversed.

Statement by Cobb, P. J.:

Charles Blocker brought his action against John W. Clark, alleging that the defendant was the sheriff of Richmond county; that H. C. Hall made an affidavit that Charles Blocker had committed the offense of simple larceny, and on this affidavit a warrant was issued for the arrest of Charles Blocker and placed in the hands of Clark, and by him turned over to his deputy for execution. On the warrant appeared the following memorandum: "Weight about 160 pounds; brown skin; five feet ten inches, farm hand; lives in Tutt's extension, on Woodlawn road." On this warrant the deputy arrested the plaintiff. At the time of the arrest the offered that would have disclosed his mistake, or if he detains the person an undue length of time without taking proper steps to establish his identity. Although but two of the cases cited in the note to sustain this statement of the general rule involved the arrest of a wrong person hearing the name appearing in the warrant, it is apparent that the similarity of names is merely a circumstance of greater or less weight to be taken into consideration in applying the rule. In Clark v. Winn, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 223, 46 S. W. 915, one of the cases referred to, the sheriff and his sureties on his bond were held liable for placing a warrant in the hands of a constable, and causing the arrest of and refusing to release the plaintiff, who bore the same name and answered the description of the accused; it appearing that an investigation would have disclosed the fact of the plaintiff's innocence. As was said by the court in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) plaintiff denied that he had committed the offense charged in the warrant, and protested that he was not the person for whom the warrant was issued. Notwithstanding this denial and protest, plaintiff was taken into custody, and the deputy refused to carry him before a judicial officer, but lodged him in jail, where he remained for four days. It is alleged that the plaintiff did not answer the description set forth in the memorandum, in that he was six feet three inches high, and was distinctly black, that he had not worked on a farm for ten years or more, but worked as a fireman for an oil company in the city of Augusta, and that he did not live and had never lived in Tutt's extension, but in the city of Augusta some distance from that place. Tutt's extension being outside the city, in the village of Harrisonville, about a half a mile distant from his place of residence. Upon being released from jail plaintiff reported to his employer, who told him that his place had been filled, as he thought he had gone to the chain gang. He had been unable to secure work as remunerative as that which he had at the time of his arrest. Damages were laid in the sum of $500. The defendant filed an answer, in which he admitted that the arrest had been made by his deputy, but denied that the plaintiff protested his innocence, etc. The statement as to the remark of his former employer was also denied. The answer further alleged that it was the duty of the defendant to execute all legal warrants placed in his hands, and that the warrant was in all respects regular. He placed it in the hands of his deputy, and the plaintiff bore the same name as the person charged in the warrant, and the deputy making the arrest acted in good faith and with reasonable diligence and caution. The answer contained this allegation: "After arresting him it that case, every circumstance except the similarity of name and description indicated that the plaintiff was not the person against whom the warrant issued.

In the other case, Wolf v. Perryman, 82 Tex. 112, 17 S. W. 772, a recovery against a sheriff was upheld where he arrested the plaintiff on a capias from another county, upon a charge of murdering a negro, and delivered him to a deputy from the county from which the capias issued; it appearing that the sheriff was informed by the plaintiff, who gave reference to several reliable persons accessible for information, that he had never been in the county in which the crime was charged to have been committed, and that the sheriff declined to investigate, notwithstanding that the plaintiff bore the same name as the party against whom the warrant issued, and had frequently boasted that he had killed a negro.

was the duty of the arresting officer to imprison him, unless he requested to be carried before a judicial officer. He made no such request. In taking plaintiff to jail said deputy sheriff conformed to the usual practice in such cases, taking steps to prevent the escape of the prisoner, but treating him with humanity in all respects, consistent with the officer's duty to keep him safely. After plaintiff was safely lodged in jail, defendant or his said deputy had no other duty to perform in reference to him. It was then for the plaintiff, who knew the law, to take steps to be brought before a judicial officer and be released." A copy of the affidavit and warrant, with the entry of arrest, was attached to the answer as an exhibit. At the trial the jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff assigns error upon the overruling of his motion for a new trial.

Mr. William H. Fleming, for plaintiff in error:

The duty of the arresting officer is to exercise reasonable diligence in bringing his prisoner before some judicial officer authorized to examine, commit, or receive bail.

Code, §§ 885, 897, 899; Lamb v. Dillard, 94 Ga. 206, 21 S. E. 463; Gordon v. Hogan, 114 Ga. 354, 40 S. E. 229; Wiggins v. Norton, 83 Ga. 148, 9 S. E. 607.

A mistake in the identity of the person, no matter how honestly made, cannot wholly defeat the right of recovery, though it may mitigate the amount of damages.

Mitchell v. Malone, 77 Ga. 301; Code, § 2963; Code 1895, § 3826.

Messrs. Joseph B. Cumming, Bryan Cumming, and George M. Beasley, for defendant in error:

If the imprisonment is by virtue of a warrant, neither the party bona fide suing it out, nor the officer who in good faith executes the same, is guilty of false imprisonment.

Even if it is conceded that the officer arrested a person other than the one named in the warrant, if the person arrested stated to the officer that he was the person named, the officer would not be liable.

The person bearing the name mentioned in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the warrant is prima facie not "the wrong man," but the right man.

Johnston v. Riley, 13 Ga. 97; West v. Cabell, supra.

Cobb, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. It is absolutely essential to the validity of a warrant that the person to be arrested should be identified by the terms of the warrant. The usual method of identifying the person to be arrested is by the insertion therein of his name. It is not, however, indispensable that the name of the person to be arrested should appear in the warrant, for a warrant may be valid although it may not contain the name of the person whose arrest is directed. But if the warrant does not contain the name it must contain sufficient data to identify the person to be arrested thereunder. This may be done by stating his occupation, his personal appearance, peculiarities, place of residence, or other means of identification. When, however, the warrant contains the name of the person, the officer executing the same must rely upon the name alone, and cannot justify the arrest of a party whose name is other than that appearing in the warrant, even though he is the person intended. Voorhees, Arrest, §§ 39, 40. A warrant issued against John Doe, "the person carrying off the cannon," was held not to justify the arrest of Levi Mead, although he was taken in the act of carrying off the cannon, and was the person intended. Mead v. Haws, 7 Cow. 332. A warrant issued for Robert J. Williams was executed by arresting Spencer Riley, and it was held that all concerned in the arrest were trespassers, although Robert J. Williams and Spencer Riley were one and the same person. In such cases it is incumbent upon the officer seeking to justify the arrest to show that the person was as well known by the one name as by the other. Johnston v. Riley, 13 Ga. 137. See also cases cited in note to Eanes v. State, 44 Am. Dec. 291. A warrant was issued against John Hoyer, and Richard Hoyer was arrested thereunder. The officer was held liable for plaintiff's imprisonment, notwithstanding it appeared that Richard Hoyer was the person against whom the warrant was intended to issue. Hoyer v. Bush, 1 Mann. & G. 775. See also West v. Cabell, 153 U. S. 78, 38 L. ed. 643, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 752. If the person arrested represents to the officer that he is the individual named in the warrant, or otherwise misleads the officer as to his identity, the arrest is not illegal; and neither is his detention under the warrant illegal until the officer receives information indicating that the person so arrested was not the person named in the warrant. 5 Enc. Laws of England, 313; Dunston v. Paterson, 2 C. B. N. S. 495. It will thus be seen that an officer arresting one not bearing the name set forth in the warrant acts at his peril, and will be held liable as a trespasser, even though the person actually arrested was the person intended to be charged, unless he makes it appear that such person was as well known by the name appearing in the warrant as by the other name which he bore. When the warrant is regular upon its face, and issues from a court of competent jurisdiction, it is the duty of the officer in whose hands it is placed to arrest the person named therein, and no other. If the person named therein is arrested, the officer is justified in making the arrest notwithstanding it may thereafter appear that the person arrested was not the person intended, and that a mistake was made in the name inserted in the warrant. The prosecutor who made a mistake as to the name might be liable to the person unlawfully arrested, but the officer would be blameless. The officer may take into consideration any information that he may receive outside of the terms of the warrant, in order to locate the person named therein, but his duty at last is to arrest the person named. The memorandum in the present case was not part of the warrant, and if the officer had arrested a person of the exact description contained in the memorandum, he would have been a trespasser, if that person did not bear the name of Charles Blocker, and was not well known by that name. If the memorandum had been a part of the warrant, the officer would have been a trespasser in following the memorandum in making the arrest, if the person arrested was not named Charles Blocker.

An officer in whose hands a warrant is placed is charged with the duty of examining the same to ascertain the person identified by the warrant. If the person is identified by description, and not by name, he must exercise due diligence in applying the description in the warrant to the person arrested. If he in good faith arrests a person answering the description in the warrant he is not a trespasser in making the arrest, but may become one if he holds the person arrested after he receives information that such person was not the person intended to be arrested. If the person is described by name only, he must likewise exercise due diligence in determining whether the person arrested bears the name specified in the warrant, and the arrest will be justified if the person bears the name, although a detention might be illegal when information comes to the officer that the person so arrested is not the person against whom the warrant was issued. If there are two or more persons, within the bailiwick of the officer in whose hands the warrant is placed, bearing the same name, the officer is charged with the duty of ascertaining, before making an arrest, which of such persons the warrant was intended for. If he decides this question in good faith, he is not a trespasser in making the arrest, although he may make a mistake and arrest the wrong person. If an officer arrest a person bearing a name stated in the warrant, and such person is described as being in his bailiwick, and there be only one person bearing such name therein, the officer is protected in making the arrest, although the person may be innocent, and there may have been a mistake made as to the name stated in the warrant. If there be two or more persons of the same name within the bailiwick, the officer may make diligent inquiry as to the identity of the person named in the warrant; and if he makes such inquiry and arrests a person of that name in good faith, believing he is the person named in the warrant, the officer is also protected. If there has been a mistake made as to the name in the warrant, and the prosecutor is responsible for such mistake, the prosecutor might be liable, but the officer would be blameless. We are aware of the importance of the question involved as to the responsibility of an officer executing a warrant where there are two or more persons bearing the name stated in the warrant. If it should be held that the officer is protected when he acts in good faith, although the wrong person may be arrested, cases will arise where a person who is innocent will be deprived of his liberty, and will have no redress for the wrong. On the other hand, if it is held that the officer acts at his peril, the administration of the law through the execution of warrants is impeded, and criminals may escape on account of the timidity or caution of the officers. We are aware that the rule that the officer in such cases acts at his peril has been laid down by the courts of respectable standing; but we think that the rule of good faith is more consonant with our system as indicated by the provisions of the Code, which declares if the imprisonment is by virtue of a warrant, neither the party bona fide suing it out, nor the officer executing the same, is guilty of false imprisonment, though the warrant be defective in form, and void for want of jurisdiction. In such cases the good faith must be determined from all the circumstances. Civil Code, 1895, § 3852. If good faith will protect an officer who deprives a citizen of his liberty under a void warrant, it would seem for a stronger reason that it should protect an officer who is armed with a valid warrant, and who, after exercising due diligence, acting in perfect good faith, makes a mistake as to the identity of the person named in the warrant.

2. When an officer makes an arrest under a warrant, it is his duty to "exercise reasonable diligence in bringing the person arrested before the person authorized to examine, commit, or receive bail." Penal Code 1895, § 899. What is reasonable diligence depends upon the peculiar facts of each case. If the officer fails to discharge the duty thus imposed upon him, he will be liable to the party injured thereby to the extent of any damages actually sustained as a direct result of the breach of duty, unless the delay was occasioned by the act of the party arrested.

3. Error is assigned upon the following extract from the charge: "So, gentlemen of the jury, you must find that the arresting officer either made this arrest out of spite, or that he did it under circumstances that showed a reckless disregard for the rights and liberties of the citizen." We think this charge erroneous and the error prejudicial to the plaintiff. Good faith will protect the officer. Personal spite or a reckless disregard of the rights of others would amount to bad faith. But the officer may not be animated by spite, his conduct be reckless, and still bad faith may exist. Good faith implies due diligence. Good faith may be negated by evidence of negligence. The failure to exercise ordinary care in a transaction like the one under consideration is inconsistent with good faith.

Error was also assigned upon the following extract from the charge: "If, under the law I have given you in charge, you find that the preponderance of evidence sustains the plaintiff's claim that he was illegally arrested, and illegally imprisoned and deprived of his liberty, then it is your duty to return a verdict for the plaintiff for such an amount as the evidence shows he is entitled to. On the other hand, if the preponderance of evidence is not on the side of the contentions of the plaintiff, then your verdict should be for the defendant." The error assigned was that, under the instruction, there could be no recovery unless there was both an unlawful arrest and an unlawful imprisonment. This instruction is subject to this criticism: The jury might have believed that the arrest was in good faith, but the subsequent detention was not, and if so, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover. Under the instruction, the jury were constrained to find for the defendant, unless they believed both the arrest and subsequent detention to be illegal.

What has been said disposes of all the assignments of error that require any discussion.

The evidence rejected was clearly hearsay, and properly repelled.

Judgment reversed.

MITTIE D. HOLLOWAY

v.

JOSEPH HOLLOWAY, Plff. in Err.

(— Ga. —, 55 S. E. 191.)

Manslaughter—turpitude.

1. The offense of voluntary manslaughter involves moral turpitude.

Divorce—conviction of crime—pardon.

2. The conviction of a married person of an offense involving moral turpitude, followed by a sentence of imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of two years or longer, gives to the other party to the marriage a right to a divorce; and this right is not affected by an executive pardon granted after the sentence has been imposed.

Headnotes by COBB, P. J.

Case Note.—Effect of pardon or commutation of sentence of criminal on conjugal rights:—Although there appear to be no decisions involving the precise question presented in HOLLOWAY v. HOLLOWAY, as to whether a pardon is available as a defense to an action for divorce upon the ground of a conviction, perhaps because the statutes of many of the states make express provision that a pardon does not revive the marriage relation or restore conjugal rights, the fundamental principle that the effect of the conviction on the marriage relation is determined by the original sentence, and is unaffected by subsequent commutation or pardon, is fully supported by authority.

In Re Deming, 10 Johns. 232, a proceeding to recover from their mother the custody of his children, brought by one who had been sentenced to the state prison for life, which sentence, by virtue of statutory provision, rendered him "civilly dead to all intents and purposes in law," but who thereafter obtained a pardon, it was said that the effect of a pardon was to acquit the offender of all the penalties annexed to the conviction and give him a new credit and capacity, the limitation of the operation on his antecedent rights being such that it could not divest any person of any right or interest which the law had permitted to be acquired and vested in consequence of the judgment, and therefore such pardon could not annul or affect the validity of a second marriage of the wife.

In Handy v. Handy, 124 Mass. 394, it was held that a husband who had been sentenced ERROR to the Superior Court for Fulton County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action for divorce. Affirmed.

Statement by Cobb, P. J.

Mittie D. Holloway brought her libel for divorce against Joseph Holloway on May 13, 1905, and alleged that they were married on December 24, 1893. In 1899 the respondent was convicted of the offense of voluntary manslaughter, and sentenced to serve a term of twenty years in the penitentiary. They have not lived together since the conviction of the respondent. In 1904 the respondent was pardoned by the governor. A demurrer to the libel was overruled, and the respondent excepted.

Mr. O. M. Duke for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. D. Kilpatrick for defendant in error.

Cobb, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The Civil Code of 1895 declares among the grounds for divorce "the conviction of either party for an offense involving moral turpitude, and under which he or she is sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of two years or longer." § 2426, par. 8. The respondent was sentenced to the penitentiary for a term exceeding two years, and the right of the libellant to a divorce depends upon whether the offense of which he was convicted involved moral turpitude. Turpitude in its ordinary sense involves the idea of inherent baseness or vileness; shameful wickedness; depravity. Webster's International Dict. In its legal to imprisonment at hard labor in the state prison for more than five years, which sentence was, by statute, classed with adultery as a ground for a divorce, could not, upon being pardoned out of prison for good behavior before the expiration of his sentence after having been imprisoned for about nine years, maintain an action for divorce against his wife upon the ground of her adultery committed after his sentence, he himself having been guilty of an offense of the same class and degree under the divorce act as adultery.

In State v. Duket, 90 Wis. 272, 31 L.R.A. 515, 48 Am. St. Rep. 928, 63 N. W. 83, it was held that the reversal of a sentence to imprisonment for life on account of error, but not for want of jurisdiction, did not operate to restore the marriage relation of the convict which had been dissolved by the sentence under a statute providing that a sentence to imprisonment for life should operate as an absolute dissolution of the marriage without any judgment of divorce or other legal process; and therefore that the person convicted could not be found sense it includes everything done contrary to justice, honesty, modesty, or good morals. Black's Law Dict.; Bouvier's Law Dict. The word "moral," which so often precedes the word "turpitude," does not seem to add anything to the meaning of the term, other than that emphasis which often results from a tautological expression. All crimes embraced within the Roman's conception of the crimen falsi involve turpitude; but it is not safe to declare that such crimes only involve turpitude. Murder involves vileness and depravity; for it is the result of an abandoned and malignant heart. Voluntary manslaughter involves the intentional destruction of human life. It is true that there is no deliberation, no malice, in the act constituting the offense; but the manslayer intends to kill, and carries out the intention in an unlawful manner. It may be the result of passion or temper, and the law in its mercy visits a less penalty than that inflicted for wilful killing; but it necessarily involves the intention to unlawfully deprive another of life. Whenever one intentionally and wrongfully takes human life, he does an act which is base, vile, depraved, and contrary to good morals. That the offense of voluntary manslaughter involves moral turpitude cannot admit serious question. See, in this connection, 5 Words & Phrases Judicially Defined, 4580.

2. The right of the libellant to a divorce results from the conviction and sentence. There are three essential ingredients in the ground for divorce. The commission of the offense involving moral turpitude, the conviction for the same, and a sentence for a term of two years or longer in the penitentiary. When this state of affairs is shown guilty of adultery in thereafter living with another woman.

The decision in Young v. Young, 61 Tex. 191, as to the noneffect of the commutation of a sentence to restore the person convicted to his conjugal rights, is sufficiently set forth in the opinion in the HOLLOWAY CASE.

In Oliver v. Oliver, 169 Mass. 592, 48 N. E. 843, and Sargood v. Sargood, 77 Vt. 498, 61 Atl. 472, it was held that, where a sentence for longer than a stated period is made a ground for divorce in favor of the husband or wife of the person so sentenced, and an indeterminate sentence has been imposed, the maximum term of imprisonment must be taken as the period governing the right to a divorce.

In this connection, reference may be made to the case of Cone v. Cone, 58 N. H. 152, in which it was held that, where a sentence to state prison for more than one year is made by statute a cause for divorce, the fact that an appeal is pending from the conviction constitutes no defense to proceedings for divorce.

to exist, the law declares the libellant is entitled to a divorce. Can this right, given by statute, be destroyed by an executive pardon? The pardon restores the convict, so far as the public is concerned, to the position he occupied before the conviction. He is no longer infamous. He may vote, hold office, and perform other public functions. Rights which have accrued to individuals as a result of the conviction are not affected by the pardon. Mr. Bishop, in his work on Marriage, Divorce, and Separation, §§ 444, 1807, says that, where conviction for a crime is declared to be a ground for a divorce, it is a defense to a divorce suit to show that the convict has been pardoned. He cites no authority for this statement. He does refer to the case of Young v. Young, 61 Tex. 191, where it was held that the commutation of the sentence of one convicted of a felony was not equivalent to a pardon. The statute of Texas provided that, if a party to a marriage was convicted of a felony and imprisoned in a state prison, this should be a ground for divorce, provided that no suit could be maintained for the conviction of either party until twelve months after final judgment of conviction, nor then if the governor should have pardoned the convict. In that case the governor had commuted the sentence of the convict within twelve months after final judgment; and this was held not to amount to a pardon within the meaning of the statute. Mr. Nelson, in his work on Divorce and Separation, says that it would seem that if, before the trial of the suit for divorce, the convict is pardoned, the divorce should not be granted. He cites no authority for this proposition. Reference is made to the case of Young v. Young, supra, and also to the case of State v. Duket, 90 Wis. 272, 31 L.R.A. 515, 48 Am. St. Rep. 928, 63 N. W. 83. In that case it was held that the reversal of a sentence of one convicted of a felony did not have the effect of restoring the conjugal rights taken away by virtue of a statute which declared that a sentence of imprisonment for life should dissolve the marriage of the person sentenced. Mr. Keezer, in his recent work on Marriage and Divorce, says that no pardon granted after the decree of divorce will restore such party to his or her conjugal rights. To sustain this proposition he cites the case of Young v. Young, supra, and Handy v. Handy, 124 Mass. 394. In the case last cited the facts were peculiar, and it is impossible to tell from the meager statement in the report exactly what was the extent of the ruling. We have been able to find no decision which is a direct ruling on the question now before us. We think the better view is that the pardon of the convict does not destroy the right to a divorce, declared by statute to arise upon conviction and sentence.

Judgment affirmed.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

ABRAHAM SCHULMAN

v.

EDWARD STANLEY WHITAKER, Appt.

(117 La. 703, 42 So. 227.)

Courts—jurisdiction—privacy.

1. The civil district court has jurisdiction of a complaint if it relates to a personal right,—the right to be left alone.

Action—character.

2. This is not an action instituted to punish an infraction of the criminal laws.

Photograph—suspect—injunction.

3. Unless it be evident that a picture should be taken to identify the person, or to detect crime, it cannot be taken; the purpose not being detection or identification. If a person is under arrest, or within the court's jurisdiction, generally there arises no necessity for the exercise of the photographer's art before his trial and conviction.

Headnotes by BREAUX, Ch. J.

Case Note.—Right to take, or retain in "rogues'" gallery, picture of one accused of crime: — An interesting question is presented in the case reported above, as to the right to exhibit in the rogues' gallery the portrait of one merely accused of crime. That the portrait of a person actually convicted of crime may be kept in the rogues' gallery as a means of identification in the event of the escape of the prisoner or his commission of a subsequent offense is unquestionable. But to hold that such a course may be adopted toward one who has never been convicted of crime, and whose guilt or innocence of the crime of which he is accused or suspected is still to be determined, would seem to be carrying police supervision to an unwarranted extent. Tiedeman, in his work on State and Federal Control of Persons and Property, vol. 1, p. 157, says, on this subject: "Another phase of police supervision is that of photographing alleged criminals and sending copies of the photograph to all detective bureaus. If this be directed by the law as punishment for a crime of which the criminal stands convicted, or if the man is in fact a criminal, and the photograph is obtained without force or compulsion, there can be no constitutional or legal objection to the act, for no right has been violated. But the practice is not confined to the convicted criminals. It is very often employed against

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans requiring defendant to destroy photographs which had been taken of the plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Benjamin Rice Forman, for appellant:

The photograph was proper.

Molineux v. Collins, 177 N. Y. 395, 65 L.R.A. 104, 69 N. E. 727; Hottinger v. New Orleans, 42 La. Ann. 630, 8 So. 575; State ex rel. New Orleans v. Theard, 48 La. Ann. 1448, 21 So. 28; Lecourt v. Gaster, 49 La. Ann. 488, 21 So. 646.

Messrs. Solomon Wolff and Gustave Lemle, for appellee:

Constitutional provisions for the security of persons and property should be liberally construed.

Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 29 L. ed. 746, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524.

Breaux, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As a reason why defendant, who is inspector of police of the city of New Orleans, directed to have plaintiff's picture taken, and a copy placed in the rogues' gallery, and others sent to other galleries in other states, he (defendant) avers that plaintiff had been accused of having received stolen property, knowing it to have been stolen, twelve different times, as he (inspector of police) had found upon investigation; and furthermore, that an information was filed against plaintiff which has never been tried; that, when plaintiff was arrested under the charge which resulted in the information filed persons who are only under suspicion. In such a case, if the suspicion is not well founded, and the suspected person is in fact innocent, such use of his photograph would be a libel, for which everyone could be held responsible who was concerned in its publication. And it would be an actionable trespass against the right of personal security, whether one is a criminal or not, to be compelled involuntarily to sit for a photograph to be used for such purposes, unless it was imposed by the statutes as a punishment for the crime of which he has been convicted."

Yet, in State ex rel. Bruns v. Clausmeier, 154 Ind. 599, 50 L.R.A. 73, 77 Am. St. Rep. 511, 57 N. E. 541, it is held that, since it is the duty of a sheriff to confine in jail and safely keep all persons in his custody awaiting trial on a charge of crime, until lawfully discharged, and, if they escape, to pursue and recapture them, he may lawfully take the portrait and measurements, weight, residence, place of birth, occupation, and personal characteristics of an accused person committed to his custody for safe-keeping, if, in his discretion, it is necessary to prevent his escape or facilitate his recapture in case he should do so. The complaint in this case did not charge that any physical force was used to induce the accused to have his picture taken, or to furnish the sheriff with such information as was not obtainable by observation. The action was brought on the sheriff's official bond, and charged the sheriff with libel by maliciously sending out the portrait of the accused and a description of his person, together with a statement of the accusations against him. The court refused to pass on the question whether or not the photographs and the words thereon were libelous, since it said that, even if they were, the sureties on his official bond would not be liable therefor, though the sheriff himself might be liable to an action.

Probably the first case in which the question of the right to place the portrait of one convicted or accused of crime in the rogues' gallery arose, was People ex rel. Joyce v. York, 27 Misc. 658, 59 N. Y. Supp. 418, in which it was held that, where a person had been convicted of an assault, and sentenced to six months in the workhouse, and had frequently been arrested, and was an associate of criminals, these facts were sufficient to warrant the taking of his photograph and placing it in the rogues' gallery; and a mandamus to compel the police authorities to remove the picture was denied. The court said that it is well settled that a mandamus will issue only to compel a public officer to perform a duty imposed upon him by law; that there was no duty in respect to the matter now before the court, imposed upon the police commissioners; and that, if they had wronged the relator at all, the wrong was in the nature of a libel, for which he had an adequate remedy at law.

In a subsequent New York case,—Owen v. Partridge, 40 Misc. 415, 82 N. Y. Supp. 248,—which was an action for an injunction to restrain the commissioner of police of New York from publishing the photograph and certain memoranda concerning the appearance or measurements of the plaintiff, who had been arrested on suspicion, but subsequently discharged, and for a mandatory direction that the negative of such likeness, together with all copies and reproductions of it, and the memoranda, be destroyed or surrendered to the plaintiff, the court said that the taking of the photograph and measurements, and their retention, exhibition, or circulation, could obviously be justified only as an exercise of the police power; that the duty of the police to "preserve the public peace, prevent crime, detect and arrest offenders" (Laws 1901, chap. 466, § 315, p. 136), gives them necessarily a wide range of incidental powers to accomplish the mandates of the statute; that the existence of the so-called rogues' gallery, and the taking of the photographs, weights, and measurements, finds its authority, if anywhere, in this provision, or in the accepted pre-existing principles of which against him, he denied having the goods; that they were subsequently found in his store.

Plaintiff states in his pleadings that he has kept a pawn shop in the city of New Orleans these eleven years past, and that he has always conducted himself properly since his residence in the city of New Orleans, which dates back to the time he opened a pawnbroker's business in this city. He alleged that after his picture had been taken he was arrested for having received stolen goods. He was tried and discharged. It remains that the plaintiff does not appear before us as one who has been convicted of crime. None the less his conduct has certainly given ground to a number of complaints. If there is any good cause for these complaints, the alleged guilty man should be tried. After his conviction, it will be time to determine whether or not his picture should be taken and placed in the rogues' gallery; not before, in this particular case, for while, from all appearances, plaintiff must have engaged in a pretty active business in his line, the proper place to inquire into the violations of the criminal law in connection with that business is before a tribunal having jurisdiction in the premises. Before that is done, his picture should not be taken.

It is true that the respondent is authorized by law to take such measures as are needful to prevent crimes, to detect and arrest offenders, and to protect the right of persons and property. Act No. 32, p. 43, of 1904. None the less, the statute does not invest him with the right in limine to resort, as relates to picture taking, to the extreme measures adopted in the present case on the evidence offered and admitted. The necessity for taking the picture is not apparent, there being no evidence of any conviction of plaintiff either in the courts of this state or of any other state. Nor is there evidence before us that it is important for his identification that his picture be taken.

The taking of pictures, as proposed, and placing them in the rogues' gallery before conviction, may prove useful in some cases, but it may lead to abuses and injustice in others.

We have found no precedent directly pertinent to the issues here, and we do not think that one should be laid down in this case to authorize recourse to the Bertillon system.

There are cases remotely analogous to the case pending before us. In one of the cases the complainant, a pretty girl, took out an injunction to prevent a business firm from making use of her picture in advertising merchandise for sale in its stores and other public places. Sensitive, proud of her beauty, she did not, it seems, fancy the use made of the pictures. The court, although considering it in the nature of privacy or a private or personal right, the asserted violation of which was hardly as dis-it is the expression; that, so far as habitual criminals are concerned,—their supervision and control,—no serious question could well be raised as to the propriety or legal character of the acts involved; but added that how far the exhibition in the rogues' gallery of the photographs of persons merely suspected of crime may be justified as a police measure may be a question not easy of solution. The court refers to Prof. Tiedeman's intimation that, where the suspicion is well founded, the right exists; but adds: "But what is a well-founded suspicion? Where the person photographed is not a habitual criminal, or has never been convicted of crime, so that preventive measures might be justified; or where the suspicion directed to a particular case has not sufficient legal basis in fact to warrant some criminal proceeding,—the definition of a 'suspicious person' becomes vague and shadowy, varying with the circumstances of each case, and measures like those under consideration may approach dangerously near an arbitrary interference with the personal rights." The court said, however, that, in the view it took of this application for an injunction, it did not deem it necessary to examine further the by-no-means-clear question of the right to take for police purposes the photograph of a person merely suspected of crime; that, conceding that there is such a right, and conceding, also, that the defendant in this case had failed to bring himself within the facts permitting its exercise, the court was of the opinion that the plaintiff had mistaken his remedy. In other words, conceding that the plaintiff's rights had been invaded, he could not seek redress for the violation by means of an injunction action; that the plaintiff's sole injury, if any, had been to his character and reputation; and that, though he may have suffered wrong and the injury be irreparable, equity could give him no relief, but he must seek his remedy at law.

Where the photograph and measurements of a person convicted of murder were taken and filed in obedience to a statute requiring the superintendent of state prisons to cause the prisoners therein confined to be measured and described in accordance with the Bertillon method for identification of criminals, it was held that, notwithstanding the subsequent reversal of the conviction and the acquittal of the accused, mandamus would not issue to compel the superintendent of state prisons to surrender the photograph and measurements. Molineux v. Collins, 177 N. Y. 395, 65 L.R.A. 104, 69 N. E. 727. Affirming 41 Misc. 154, 83 N. Y. Supp. 943. The court said that the photograph, description, and measurements which the law required the superintendent to se-agreeable as the complainer alleged, refused to make the injunction perpetual; it said that to grant the injunction would open a vast field of litigation. Roberson v. Rochester Folding Box Co. 171 N. Y. 538, 59 L.R.A. 478, 89 Am. St. Rep. 828, 64 N. E. 442.

It is a matter of public history, known to everyone, that the cartoonists apply their energy and exhaust their ingenuity in representing, with ridiculous exaggerations, the peculiarities of persons in journals and magazines. The photographer and the snapshot amateurs take the pictures of the willing and the unwilling. Generally, this is taken with as much good nature as the person caricatured can possibly command. We do not know that it has afforded any ground for litigation, when not exaggerated to the point of impeaching character. Here the purpose goes much further. The picture is to remain as evidence of a damning nature.

Whilst expressing the foregoing views, we desire to have it well understood that we are decidedly of opinion that cases may arise justifying the officer in charge of the police department in ordering a picture to be taken; but the necessity must be evident. Convicts and hardened criminals may forfeit all rights to consideration; to such an extent, at any rate, that their pictures may be taken if necessary to their identification, and that without much delay.

The gallery in question should not be broken up; the collection in other cases should remain as it is, although there is no special statute on the subject. Law and right have the authority to protect themselves. But there is no necessity of going any further than actually necessary in that direction, save to say that the picture of the hardened criminal, when he is detected in the commission of a crime, can be taken; the pictures of fugitives from justice and others when necessary to their identification. We go no further than to decide that there was no necessity to take the picture for identification, nor to guard against the escape of the plaintiff. The following are our principal reasons: Plaintiff pays a high license. This is not a defense, and would not be so considered in any court of criminal jurisdiction. It might, however, be considered in the matter of identification or of escape. Again, plaintiff is compelled to report the character of his business each Monday morning to the inspector of police, in accordance with § 6651, council series, relating to pawn shops. This also is not a defense, but it is a very considerable check on wrongdoing and irregularity of the business.

Plaintiff's place of business seems to be well known; it is not charged that he has ever sought to conceal himself. There is evidently no hesitation felt in making affidavits against him. He has never sought, as far as we know, to evade meeting these affidavits. He is within the jurisdiction and under the authority of the district court. It cure and preserve were a part of the public records, which the superintendent had no power to remove or destroy, even though the prisoner's sentence had been reversed and he had been acquitted of the charge against him, and that there was no relief for this apparent injustice to one acquitted of the charge against him, except through the legislature.

In Shaffer v. United States, 24 App. D. C. 417, it was held that the taking by the government of a photograph of one accused of homicide while he was in custody, and the use of the photograph on the trial to identify him, did not constitute a violation of any constitutional right where no excessive force or illegal duress was employed by the officer in taking the picture. The court in this case said: "We know that it is the daily practice of the police officers and detectives of crime to use photographic pictures for the discovery and identification of criminals, and that without such means many criminals would escape detection or identification. It could as well be contended that a prisoner could lawfully refuse to allow himself to be seen while in prison by a witness brought to identify him, or that he could rightfully refuse to uncover himself or to remove a mark in court to enable witnesses to identify him as the party ac- 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

cused, as that he could rightfully refuse to allow an officer in whose custody he remained to set an instrument and take his likeness for purposes of proof and identification. It is one of the usual means employed in the police service of the country, and it would be matter of regret to have its use unduly restricted upon any fanciful theory or constitutional privilege."

A companion case to that of SCHULMAN v. WHITAKER was Itzkovitch v. Whitaker, 115 La. 479, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1147, 39 So. 499, where it was held that the publication of an innocent man's photograph in the rogues' gallery gave rise to sufficient grounds to sustain an injunction. A temporary injunction was therefore granted to prevent the further exhibition of the plaintiff's photograph which had already been sent to the rogues' gallery; and, when the case was heard upon its merits, the injunction was made permanent, and the negative of the photographs ordered to be returned, and all entries of the photographs and of the measurements to be erased and canceled from the record. It was held that the picture of a person accused of crime should not be taken until after his conviction, unless it is evident that it should be taken before conviction for the purpose of identification or for the detection of the crime.

does not sufficiently appear that his picture is necessary to prove his guilt or for the identification of his person. For these reasons, the prosecutions before the court having jurisdiction in matter of crime and offenses will have to be exhausted in at least one case to justify in this case ordering the plaintiff's picture to be placed in the rogues' gallery.

The foregoing applies equally to the Itzkovitch Case, handed down this day.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF KANSAS

v.

B. F. BRIGGS, Appt.

(— Kan. —, 86 Pac. 447.)

False pretenses—information.

1. An information, which charged that the defendant obtained a draft for money as a commission for a loan on a farm, on the false and fraudulent pretenses that he was an agent engaged in loaning money on Headnotes by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

Case Note.—Effect of coupling future promise with false pretenses:—It is generally held that the consequence attached to a false statement as to a past or existing fact is not overthrown by an accompanying promise to do some act in the future which operated as a part of the inducement under which the prosecutor parted with his property. Thus, upon the facts stated in each of the following cases, the defendants were held to be guilty of obtaining the property by false pretenses:

In Pearce v. State, 115 Ala. 115, 22 So. 502, defendant falsely represented that he was a pension agent, coupled with his promise that he would obtain a pension for the defrauded party.

In Donohoe v. State, 59 Ark. 377, 27 S. W. 226, defendant promised to pay for lumber which he used in the erection of a house upon land which he falsely pretended he had purchased. The seller of lumber in this state is entitled to a lien on land belonging to the purchaser upon which the house is erected, for the purchase price of the lumber.

In Thomas v. State, 90 Ga. 437, 16 S. E. 94, the false representation was that a sale had already been effected, coupled with a promise to complete it by making delivery.

In Holton v. State, 109 Ga. 127, 34 S. E. 358, the false pretense was that defendant had title to certain land, made for the purpose of inducing another to purchase it, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

farms, and that he had much property and was financially responsible, and had a large amount of money under his control, was not bad because it failed to state whether the application of the borrower for the loan was oral or written; and no error was committed in denying a motion to make the information more definite and certain in that respect.

Same—representation as to business.

2. A representation that a person is in a business or situation in which he is not, made for the purpose of defrauding another, and by which money or property is fraudulently obtained, is a false pretense.

Same—future promise.

3. The coupling of a future promise with a false pretense does not relieve the false pretense of its criminal character.

Same—evidence of other offenses.

4. Testimony that the defendant had made similar false representations and pretenses to others is admissible to show his knowledge of the falsity of the representations made in the present case and his guilty intent in making them.

(July 6, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Crawford County convicting him of obtaining money by false pretenses. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

coupled with his promise that he would defend the title in the future.

In Smith v. State, 116 Ga. 537, 42 S. E. 766, the false pretense was that the prosecutor's son had sent the accused to the prosecutor with a request to let him have a small sum of money on the son's credit, coupled with accused's expressed intention of using the same in moving upon the son's land.

In State v. Montgomery, 56 Iowa, 195, 9 N. W. 120, the false pretense was that the defendant had goods in the possession of a railroad company and needed money to pay freight thereon, coupled with his promise to repay the same upon the arrival of the goods.

In State v. Fooks, 65 Iowa, 196, 21 N. W. 561, the false pretense was that defendant's brother was an English nobleman and was soon to arrive with money for him, coupled with his promise to use this money in repayment of the sum obtained from the defrauded party.

In State v. Hollingsworth (Iowa) 109 N. W. 1003, the false pretense was that defendant had arranged to go into business, coupled with his promise that he would use the money obtained in establishing the business, and would marry the prosecutrix.

In State v. Cowdin, 28 Kan. 269, the false pretenses were that defendant was procuring a loan from another with which to pay off certain notes secured by a mortgage held by the prosecutor, and that he had come for

Mr. E. C. Clark, for appellant:

Such of the representations as are not promises to do something in the future are in, and of themselves immaterial representations which will not sustain the action.

State v. Palmer, 50 Kan. 325, 32 Pac. 29; State v. Knott, 124 N. C. 814, 32 S. E. 798.

Messrs. C. C. Coleman, Attorney General, and John M. Wayde, for appellee:

False pretenses with reference to existing facts, coupled with a false promise to do something in the future, come within the statute.

1 McClain, Crim. Law, § 678; State v. Gordon, 56 Kan. 64, 42 Pac. 346; Hughes, Crim. Law & Proc. § 596, p. 163; Taylor v. Com. 94 Ky. 281, 22 S. W. 217; Thomas v. People, 34 N. Y. 351; Bobbitt v. State, 87 Ala. 91, 6 So. 378; Com. v. Stevenson, 127 Mass. 446; Cowan v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 617, 56 S. W. 751.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

B. F. Briggs was convicted of obtaining money from Henry Mattox by means of false and fraudulent pretenses. In the information it was charged, in substance, that Briggs represented that he was a loan agent, engaged in loaning money on real estate; that he was financially responsible, and the purpose of paying off such notes, coupled with his promise to pay off the notes upon prosecutor's executing a release of the mortgage upon the record book.

In State v. Gordon, 56 Kan. 64, 42 Pac. 346, the false pretense was that defendant and an Indian had in their possession a gold brick which they were about to take to the mint to be coined into money, coupled with defendant's promise to deliver the brick to the prosecutor to be taken by him to the mint, and to allow him to retain one third of the money coined therefrom.

In Com. v. Moore, 89 Ky. 542, 12 S. W. 1066, the false pretenses were that a mob was then threatening to take prosecutrix's son from jail, where he was confined, and kill him; that defendant had been employed as his counsel; and that to protect him it was necessary to remove him to the jail of another county before dark; coupled with his implied promise that he would secure the removal.

In State v. Jules, 85 Md. 305, 36 Atl. 1027, the false pretense was that defendant possessed extraordinary and supernatural power to cure, coupled with his promise to cure in the future.

In People v. Winslow, 39 Mich. 505, the false pretense was that defendants had a position to give out, or one in mind which the prosecutor could fill, coupled with a promise to procure the situation for the prosecutor.

worth from $45,000 to $60,000; that he had under his control $500,000 to loan upon farms; and that he would make Mattox a loan of $3,000 on his farm, at an interest rate of 5 per cent and a commission of $120, one half of which was to be paid at once and the balance when the loan was completed; and that, relying on these representations, Mattox contracted for the loan and sent Briggs a draft for $60, the value of which was realized by Briggs. It is alleged that the representations were false and fraudulent; that Briggs had no money to loan, and was not engaged in making loans on farms; that he had neither money nor credit, but was wholly insolvent; and that he never intended to effect a loan, but made the false and fraudulent representations with the intent to cheat and defraud Mattox out of the draft and the $60 obtained upon it. By motions to make definite and certain and to quash appellant challenged the sufficiency of the information.

The motion to make an information definite and certain is an anomaly in criminal procedure. Ordinarily an indictment or information which fails to particularize, or lacks in fullness of statement, is open to attack by motion to quash. Courts sometimes require specification of particular things in what is known as a bill of particulars, but 614, the false pretense was that a worthless note, secured by mortgage on a lot, was worth its face value, and that the mortgaged lot was worth double the amount of the note, coupled with a promise to find a purchaser of the note and mortgage.

In State v. Vandenburg, 159 Mo. 230, 60 S. W. 79, the false pretense was that defendant was the authorized agent of a certain insurance company, coupled with his promise to deliver a policy to the defrauded party.

In State v. King, 67 N. H. 219, 34 Atl. 461, the false pretense was that defendant was a doctor of medicine, coupled with his promise to deliver medicine the next morning.

In Watson v. People, 87 N. Y. 561, 41 Am. Rep. 397, Affirming 26 Hun, 76, the false representation was that a horse was sound, kind, and true, accompanied by written warranty. The court said: "It would not exempt the prisoner from the consequence of a false pretense made as to an existing material fact because it was combined with a promise for the future."

In People v. Jefferey, 82 Hun, 409, 31 N. Y. Supp. 267, the false pretense was that defendant was agent for a responsible chartered company dealing in seed oats, coupled with his promise that, if the defrauded party would buy oats, the company would sell for him twice the quantity of the same price per bushel, when the crop raised therefrom had matured.

In Com. v. Wallace, 114 Pa. 405, 60 Am. Rep. 353, 6 Atl. 685, the false pretense was the making of such an order is largely within the discretion of the trial court. Hughes, Crim. Law & Proc. § 2879; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 643. If the motion to make definite and certain were permissible, or should be treated as a motion for a bill of particulars, the court would not have been justified in allowing it. The supposed defect is that the information did not disclose whether the application of Mattox for a loan of money was in writing or only an oral one. The application was a mere incident in the transaction, and, so far as the offense is concerned, it is wholly immaterial whether it was written or oral. State v. Baker, 57 Kan. 544, 46 Pac. 947. It was not the basis of the false pretenses, and the money was not obtained by means of the application. The important features of the offense charged were the false representations made with intent to defraud and the obtaining of money by reason of them, and these matters were fully stated in the information. It is the things said and done by Briggs, and not by Mattox, that were material, and which formed the basis of the offense charged in the information.

Upon the motion to quash, it is contended that the representations alleged are not material, and are mere promises to be performed in the future. It is true, as contended, that a mere promise to do something in the future, however false, is not an offense. "The false pretense relied upon to constitute an offense under the statute must relate to a past event, or to some present existing fact, and not to something to happen in the future." Re Snyder, 17 Kan. 546. Although some of the representations were mere promises, others were of existing facts and are that the assets of a certain bank were largely in excess of its debts and liabilities, and that the bank was solvent and able to pay all its debts and liabilities, coupled with the promise that the money deposited would not be used to pay any previously contracted debts of the bank.

In Com. ex rel. Gordon v. Keeper of County Prison, 15 W. N. C. 282, the defendant falsely represented that he possessed the power to produce the spirits of the dead, accompanied by an executory promise to produce such spirits.

In Brown v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 22 S. W. 22, the false pretense was that the defendant was the owner of certain live stock, coupled with his promise to give a mortgage thereon.

In Boscow v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 390, 26 S. W. 625, the false pretense was that defendant was a practising physician, and was associated with other physicians in the practice of medicine, coupled with his promise to treat and cure the defrauded party's wife.

In Rex v. Asterley, 7 Car. & P. 191, the defendant falsely claimed that upon prior occasions, by going to certain parties, he had secured a reduction on certain fines imposed, and promised that he would secure a reduction of one half the fine imposed upon prosecutrix's father.

In Reg. v. Bates, 3 Cox, C. C. 201, the prisoner falsely represented that he was a provision dealer, and that he had the means of paying for certain property, and promised to pay for the same in the future.

In Reg. v. Fry, 7 Cox, C. C. 394, the prisoner falsely claimed that she kept a house at a particular place, and that, if the prosecutrix would lend the money, she could go to the shop and live with her until she secured a situation, and that she would repay the money when they got home.

In Reg. v. West, 8 Cox, C. C. 12, the prisoner obtained the money by falsely representing that he had bought certain skins, and by promising that he would bring the skins and sell them to the prosecutrix.

In Reg. v. Jennison, 9 Cox, C. C. 158, the defendant falsely represented to an unmarried woman that he was a single man, coupled with his promise that he would lay out the money obtained from her in furnishing a house for them to live in, and that he would then marry her.

In Reg. v. Speed, 15 Cox, C. C. 24, defendant falsely represented that a new directory was about to be published for which he was collecting names and information, and for one shilling promised to insert the defrauded party's name in large type.

In Reg. v. Lee, 23 U. C. Q. B. 340, the prisoner obtained money by falsely stating that prosecutor's note was at a lawyer's office, and promised to go there and get it and deliver it to the prosecutor the next morning, when in fact the prisoner had sold the note to another party.

Although a promise to do something in the future is coupled with the false statement of an existing fact, yet, if the property is parted with by relying on the promise alone, the offense is not committed. Jackson v. People, 18 Ill. App. 508; State v. Tripp, 113 Iowa, 698, 84 N. W. 546; People v. Hart, 35 Misc. 182, 71 N. Y. Supp. 492.

In Ranney v. People, 22 N. Y. 413, the defendant represented that he had employment for the complainant, which does not appear to have been false, coupled with his promise to employ complainant at a future time, when he did not in fact intend to employ him. This was held insufficient to sustain the criminal prosecution. This case has been occasionally criticized, but, in the light of the meager facts, it seems to have been but an application of the accepted rule that, "unless there is a false representation, upon which the false promise is based, there can be no conviction for the false promise alone involves no criminal consequences." See State v. Haines, 23 S. C. 170.

material. It was alleged that Briggs represented himself to be a responsible agent, engaged in making loans on real estate and to the farmers of southeastern Kansas, whereas he was not so engaged, and was not making loans on real estate to farmers. A misrepresentation as to the business in which a person is engaged for the purpose of defrauding another, and by which money or property is obtained, is a false pretense. It is a false pretense where a man falsely represents himself to be in a situation or business in which he is not. Higler v. People, 44 Mich. 299, 38 Am. Rep. 267, 6 N. W. 664; Taylor v. Com. 94 Ky. 281, 22 S. W. 217; Com. v. Stevenson, 127 Mass. 446; Pearce v. State, 115 Ala. 115, 22 So. 502; People v. Dalton, 2 Wheeler, Crim. Cas. 161; Thomas v. People, 34 N. Y. 351; Hughes, Crim. Law. & Proc. § 596; 19 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 401. Then there were the representations that he had a large amount of property and was in good financial standing, whereas it is alleged that he was absolutely insolvent. Added to these was the representation, which was also negated, that he had $500,000 at his command and under his control. These representations were not mere promises, nor can they be regarded as immaterial. 19 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 398. That there may have been connected with them future promises, or other matters of less consequence, does not relieve the false pretenses of their criminal character. It has already been determined that "the mere fact that a false pretense of an existing or past fact is accompanied by a future promise will not relieve the defendant or take the case out of the operation of the statute." State v. Gordon, 56 Kan. 67, 42 Pac. 346. It is not necessary to a conviction that the false pretenses should be the sole inducement to the obtaining of the money or property. It is enough if they have a controlling influence, although other minor considerations may concur. It was said in Re Snyder, supra, that "it is not necessary to constitute the offense of obtaining goods by false pretenses that the owner should have been induced to part with his property solely and entirely by pretenses which were false; nor need the pretenses be the paramount cause of the delivery [to the prisoner]. It is sufficient if they are a part of the moving cause, and without them the prosecutor would not have parted with the property."

There is a contention that the information is bad for duplicity, because it charges that the pretenses were made for the purpose of obtaining both draft and money. It is said, too, that the draft was obtained in Crawford county, where the prosecution was had, while the money was obtained upon it in Labette county. Only one offense was charged, and it arose out of the single transaction of obtaining the draft for $60 by false pretenses. The averment that he had collected the money on the draft did not state an additional offense, nor invalidate the information. State v. Pryor, 53 Kan. 657, 37 Pac. 169; State v. McDonald, 59 Kan. 241, 52 Pac. 453; State v. Meade, 56 Kan. 690, 44 Pac. 619. Nor can there be a valid objection to the jurisdiction of the court. The false representations and pretenses were made in Crawford county, and the draft was mailed by Mattox to Briggs in the same county. It was received in Labette county, it is true; but the general rule is that the venue is in the county where the property is obtained by the false pretense. The draft was obtained by the false pretense. The draft was obtained from Mattox when he surrendered possession of it by placing it in the post-office, addressed to the appellant. The Post-office Department is deemed to be the agent of the appellant in the same way that a common carrier would have been his agent if the draft had been given to it for delivery to the appellant. Re Stephenson, 67 Kan. 556, 73 Pac. 62; Com. v. Wood, 142 Mass. 459, 462, 8 N. E. 432; Reg. v. Jones, 1 Den. C. C. 551; Reg. v. Leech, Dears. C. C. 642; 1 McClain, Crim. Law, § 696.

Appellant complains of the admission of the testimony of three witnesses to the effect that he had made the same representations to them as he had to Mattox, and had conducted similar transactions in regard to loans on farms, but that he had not effected a loan. This testimony was doubtless admitted, and was admissible, for the purpose of showing knowledge of the falsity of the representations and guilty intent in making them. Briggs had held himself out as one who had made loans to farmers and who was able to make such loans. Evidence of the transaction with others tended to prove his fraudulent scheme, that he knew his representations to Mattox were false, and that he had made them with the intent to defraud. A fair statement of the rule is found in Underhill on Criminal Evidence, § 438, where he says: "Evidence of similar offenses, involving the making of other false representations, is admissible against the prisoner to show that he was aware of the falsity of the statements made by him in the present instance, and that, knowing them to be false, he made them with the intent to deceive. Evidence of similar false pretenses is particularly relevant when it appears that the fraudulent act for which the accused is on trial does not stand alone, but is a part of a scheme not merely to defraud one individual, but to swindle the community at large." See also State v. Myers, 82 Mo. 558, 52 Am. Rep. 389; State v. Jackson, 112 Mo. 585, 20 S. W. 674; DuBois v. People, 200 Ill. 157, 93 Am. St. Rep. 183, 65 N. E. 658; Com. v. Lubinsky, 182 Mass. 142, 64 N. E. 966; State v. Dexter, 115 Iowa, 678, 87 N. W. 417; State v. Southall, 77 Minn. 296, 79 N. W. 1007; People v. Peckens, 153 N. Y. 576, 47 N. E. 833; Crum v. State, 148 Ind. 401, 47 N. E. 833; Carnell v. State, 85 Md. 1, 36 Atl. 117; Farmer v. State, 100 Ga. 41, 28 S. E. 26; Rafferty v. State, 91 Tenn. 655, 16 S. W. 728; Tarbox v. State, 38 Ohio St. 581; People v. Henssler, 48 Mich. 49, 11 N. W. 804; Wood v. United States, 16 Pet. 342, 10 L. ed. 987; Reg. v. Rhodes, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 83, 79 L. T. N. S. 360; Queen v. Ollis [1900] 2 Q. B. 758, 83 L. T. N. S. 251; Hughes, Crim. Law & Proc. § 647; 19 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 443.

Other objections are made to rulings on the admission of testimony, but there is nothing substantial in them. The requested instructions which the court refused were manifestly incomplete and incorrect, and the charge given by the court fairly presented the issues in the case to the jury.

There appears to be sufficient testimony to support the verdict, and, no error being found, the judgment will be affirmed.

Master—interference with contract rights—constitutional law.

A statute forbidding an employer to exact an agreement from an employee not to join a labor union infringes his constitutional rights of liberty.

(Edward T. Bartlett, J., dissents.)

(May 25, 1906.)

Case Note.—Constitutionality of statutes forbidding employer to exact an agreement from employee not to join labor union:

—The right of an employer to stipulate in a contract of hiring that the employee shall not become a member of any labor union, or, if already a member of such a union, that he shall withdraw therefrom, would seem to be a fundamental part of the constitutional guaranty of liberty of contract. That the courts so regard it is shown 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by the People from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment of the Court of Special Sessions for the City of New York convicting defendant of violating the statute against contracts requiring employees not to join labor unions. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert S. Johnstone, with Mr. William Travers Jerome, for appellant:

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is provided by § 1 of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." It is provided by § 1 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of New York that "no member of this state shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to any citizen thereof, unless by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers," and by § 6 of said article that no person shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The free and untrammelled right to contract is a part of the liberty guaranteed to every citizen by the Federal and state Constitutions. Personal liberty is always subject to restraint when its exercise affects the safety, health, or moral and general welfare of the public; but, subject to such restraint, an employer and employee may make and enforce such contract relating to labor as they may agree upon. In 1887 the legislature added to the Penal Code § 171a, Mo. 163, 29 L.R.A. 257, 50 Am. St. Rep. 443, 31 S. W. 781; State v. Bateman, 7 Ohio N. P. 487; State ex rel. Zillmer v. Kreutzberg, 114 Wis. 530, 58 L.R.A. 748, 91 Am. St. Rep. 934, 90 S. W. 1098; PEOPLE v. MARCUS.

It is held in some of these cases that such contracts are also void because in violation of the constitutional provision against special legislation. And that statutes of this kind cannot be upheld as a police regulation has been declared in every case in which that contention has been raised.

As stated in Gillespie v. People, supra, if an owner cannot be deprived of his property without due process of law, he cannot be deprived of any of the essential attributes which belong to the right of property without due process of law. And the right of property involves as one of its essential attributes the right not only to contract, but also to terminate contracts.

That the interest of employees as well as of employers is protected by decisions holding such statutes unconstitutional is well stated in the language of the court in State ex rel. Zillmer v. Kreutzberg as follows: "Free will in making private contracts and even in greater degree in refusing to make them, is one of the most important and sacred of the individual rights intended to be protected. . . . We must not forget that our government is founded on the idea of equality of all individuals before the law. Such restraints as may be placed on one may be placed on another. If the liberty of the employer to contract or refuse to contract may be denied, so may that of the employee. In answering the question now before us, we may not forget the possibility of being called on to answer whether the legislature may make a criminal of the employee who quits, for example, because his employer joins a blacklisting association; because nonunion men or members of some other union are employed, or nonunion or forbidden machines or materials are used; 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

because of an obnoxious foreman; because excessive hours of work are required; because compelled to trade at employer's store or board at his boarding house; or because of any other fact or conduct now considered entirely adequate reason for refusing or leaving a particular service. It must not be forgotten if, as counsel for the state argues, the laborer is too weak to meet the employer on equal terms in the field of contract, that he will be far more subject to the latter's control and oppression in the field of politics, and that laws of the above character will surely come, if within the proper province of the legislature, unless, as we have faith to believe, the character and the individuality of the wage earners of the country are sufficient to maintain their independence—both contractual and political—in a field of equal rights under the law, and of full liberty to each to sell and buy labor to and from whom he will."

In only one case—that of Davis v. State, 30 Ohio L. J. 342,—has the constitutionality of such a statute been sustained. In this case it was held that an act making it unlawful for any employer to prevent employees from belonging to any labor organization, or to coerce or attempt to coerce employees by discharging or threatening to discharge them because of their connection with such organizations, was constitutional. But this decision was rendered by an inferior court before the rendition of any of the decisions of higher courts cited above, and was repudiated in the later Ohio case of State v. Bateman, supra.

In harmony with the cases denying the constitutionality of such a statute, is the decision in Wallace v. Georgia, C. & N. R. Co. 94 Ga. 732, 22 S. E. 579, denying the constitutionality of an analogous statute requiring an employer to give a discharged workman a certificate stating the reasons of the discharge, on the ground that the right of discharge may be exercised without any reason or explanation.

as follows: "Any person or persons, employer or employers of labor, and any person or persons of any corporation or corporations, on behalf of such corporation or corporations, who shall hereafter coerce or compel any person or persons, employee or employees, laborer or mechanic, to enter into an agreement, either written or verbal, from such person, persons, employee, laborer, or mechanic, not to join or become a member of any labor organization, as a condition of such person or persons securing employment, or continuing in the employment of any such person or persons, employer or employers, corporation or corporations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." The constitutional right of the legislature to enact that section of the Penal Code is challenged by the defendant, and the question is now presented for consideration, because of the arrest and conviction of the defendant for a violation thereof.

On December 1, 1904, the H. Marcus Skirt Company, a corporation, as the party of the first part, and H. Scheinbaum, as the party of the second part, entered into an agreement, the material parts of which are as follows: "Party of the first part agrees to employ party of the second part as a piece worker, and party of the first part agrees to pay for all finished work only on each and every Tuesday. Party of the second part hereby agrees not to belong to any labor union or to take part in any strike against the party of the first part, and to work as an individual in the open shop of party of the first part. Party of the second part further agrees that in the event of not complying with all the articles herein mentioned to forfeit to the party of the first part his money due for all work unpaid. Party of the second part also agrees to deposit $1.00 each week, which will be deducted from his salary until the amount reaches $10; same to be held as a forfeit in the event of his not complying with all the above stipulations. H. Marcus Skirt Company agrees to keep party of the second part employed as long as he proves satisfactory." Thereafter an information was filed in a court of special sessions in which it alleged that the defendant is a person of said corporation and an employer of labor, and that he "did on behalf of such corporation, and as such employer of labor, coerce and compel one Hyman Scheinbaum to enter into a written agreement on the part of and from him the said Hyman Scheinbaum not to join or become a member of any labor organization as a condition of the said Hyman Scheinbaum securing employment from and continuing in the employment of the said H. Marcus Skirt Co." On such information, a warrant was issued and the defendant was arraigned and pleaded guilty. He thereupon made a motion in arrest of judgment upon the ground "that it appears upon the face of the information that the facts therein stated do not constitute a crime, . . . that the statute upon which said information is based contravenes the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and is therefore null and void and that said statute contravenes the Constitution of the state of New York, in that it restrains the right to free contract for a purpose not calculated, intended, convenient, or appropriate to protect the public health or to serve the public comfort or safety." The motion in arrest of judgment was denied, and the defendant was fined $5, which he paid under protest, and an appeal was taken to the appellate division, which reversed the judgment of conviction. People v. Marcus, 110 App. Div. 255, 97 N. Y. Supp. 322. From the order of reversal, this appeal is taken.

The legislative intent in the use of the words "coerce or compel" in said section of the Penal Code is apparent on reading the section. They were not intended to refer to physical violence or interference with the person of the employee. In Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45, 49 L. ed. 937, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539, the court, in construing the words of § 110 of the labor law (chap. 415, p. 485, Laws of New York, 1897), as follows: "No employee shall be required or permitted to work in a biscuit, bread, or cake bakery . . . more than sixty hours in any one week or more than ten hours in any one day," says: "The mandate of the statute . . . is the substantial equivalent of an enactment that 'no employee shall contract or agree to work' more than ten hours per day." In the case now before us the mandate of the statute is the substantial equivalent of an enactment that a person shall not make the employment, or the continuance of an employment, of a person conditional upon the employee not joining or becoming a member of a labor organization. There is nothing in the information upon which the warrant against the defendant was issued to show that there was any interference with the freedom of Scheinbaum in deciding whether he would enter into the contract with the corporation. The courts of this state recognize the right of employees and employers to organize and cooperate for any lawful purpose. Contracts for labor may be freely made with individuals or a combination of individuals, and, so long as they do not interfere with public safety, health, or morals, they are not illegal. The views of this court as to what constitutes freedom to contract in relation to the purchase and sale of labor, and as to what contracts relating thereto are lawful and enforceable, were stated with much detail and ability by the members of the court when the cases of National Protective Asso. v. Cumming, 170 N. Y. 315, 58 L.R.A. 135, 88 Am. St. Rep. 648, 63 N. E. 369, and Jacobs v. Cohen, 183 N. Y. 207, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 292, 76 N. E. 5, were decided; and the decisions in those cases are substantially controlling in the determination of this appeal.

In National Protective Asso. v. Cumming, supra, it was said that a person may refuse to work for another on any ground that he may regard as sufficient, and the employer has no right to demand a reason for it; but, even if the reason is that the employee refuses to work with another who is not a member of his organization, it does not affect his right to stop work, or to refuse to enter upon employment. The converse of this statement must be true, and an employer of labor may refuse to employ a person who is a member of any labor organization, or he may make an employment conditional upon the person employed refraining from joining or becoming a member of a labor organization. It is a well-known fact that combinations of employees, and also of employers, require their members to do or refrain from doing many things which they deem to their individual and combined advantage, while a person not a member of such an organization can act in accordance with the terms of such agreement as he may choose to make. A person employing labor may decide that it is to his advantage to employ only union labor, and be willing to enter into an agreement necessary to procure such labor; or he may decide that it is to his advantage to employ nonunion labor, in which case he may also decide that it is to his advantage to make the employment conditional upon an agreement that such employee will not join or become a member of a labor organization.

In Jacobs v. Cohen, supra, an employees' union sued certain manufacturing employers on a promissory note given by them as collateral security to be applied as liquidated damages for the violation of a certain agreement by which the manufacturing employers agreed not to employ any help whatsoever other than members of said labor union who should procure a pass card showing that they were in good standing in said union; and by which they further agreed to conform to the rules and regulations of said union, and cease to employ anyone not in good standing in said union, and by which they further agreed to many restrictive and other provisions relating to the conduct of their business, which are stated more fully in the prevailing and dissenting opinions in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

this court. The answer in the second separate defense alleged, in substance, that the contract was in restraint of trade, and that its purpose is to combine employers and employees whereby the freedom of the citizen in pursuing his lawful trade and calling is, through said contract, combination, and arrangement, hampered and restricted, and that it is also for the purpose of coercing workmen to become members of a particular employees' organization under penalty of loss of position and deprivation of employment and that it is against public policy and unlawful. Two questions were submitted to this court, viz.: "(1) Is a contract made by an employer of labor, by which he binds himself to employ and to retain in his employ only members in good standing of a single labor union, consonant with public policy and enforceable in the courts of justice in this state?" "(2) Is the 'second' separate defense, contained in the answer herein of the defendants Morris Cohen and Louis Cohen, insufficient upon the face thereof to constitute a defense?" Both of these questions were answered in the affirmative; and the court says: "Whatever else may be said of it, this is the case of an agreement voluntarily made by an employer with his workmen, which bound the latter to give their skilled services for a certain period of time, upon certain conditions, regulating the performance of the work to be done and restricting the class of workmen, who should be engaged upon it, to such persons as were in affiliation with an association organized by the employer's workmen with reference to the carrying on of the very work. It would seem as though an employer should be unquestionably free to enter into such a contract with his workmen for the conduct of the business without its being deemed obnoxious upon any ground of public policy. If it might operate to prevent some persons from being employed by the firm, or, possibly, from remaining in the firm's employment, that is but an incidental feature. Its restrictions were not of an oppressive nature, operating generally in the community to prevent such craftsmen from obtaining employment and from earning their livelihood. It was but a private agreement between an employer and his employees concerning the conduct of the business for a year, and securing to the latter an absolute right to limit the class of their fellow workmen to those persons who should be in affiliation with an organization, entered into with the design of protecting their interests in carrying on the work."

That freedom to contract which entitles an employer to make by agreement his place of business wholly within the control of a labor union entitles him, if he so desires, to require of his employees that they be wholly independent of any labor union.

The order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed.

Edward T. Bartlett, J., dissenting:

I vote to reverse the order of the appellate division and to affirm the judgment of conviction. The freedom to contract should be untrammelled. A person desiring employment ought not to be required to abstain from joining any labor organization, nor should he be compelled to join a labor organization. The statute should have covered both cases. I regard this legislation as a step in the right direction, although it was evidently drawn in the interest of labor organizations and without regard to securing absolute freedom of contract. The employer is to be protected and the employed as well. I trust the day is not far distant when to every working man will be open all the avenues of employment, whether he belongs to labor unions or other organizations, or stands alone upon his individual right to work for such a wage as seems to him just. This statute is not, in my opinion, unconstitutional, but is to be regarded as a step in the direction dictated by every consideration of public policy.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

JAMES MAY

v.

WILLIAM M. PENNELL.

(101 Me. 516, 64 Atl. 885.)

Suicide—attempt—crime.

An attempt to commit suicide is not a crime in the absence of statute making it such, or making suicide a crime.

(August 11, 1906.)

EXCEPTIONS by petitioner to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Cumberland County denying a discharge of petitioner on a writ of habeas corpus from custody to which he had been committed under a sentence after conviction of attempt to commit suicide. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William A. Connellan for plaintiff.

Whitehouse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner was indicted in the superior court for Cumberland county for the alleged crime of attempting to commit suicide, and upon conviction was sentenced at the May term, 1906, to imprisonment at labor in the county jail for the term of eleven months. Thereupon he presented to a single justice his petition for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain a release from imprisonment, on the ground that the act charged in the indictment is not a crime in this state, and that the sentence inflicted upon him was not warranted by law. The justice overruled this contention pro forma, and refused to discharge the petitioner. The case comes to the law court on exceptions to this ruling.

By the early common law of England suicide was ranked among infamous crimes, and held to be a "species of felony." It was punished by a forfeiture to the King of the goods and chattels of felo de se, and an ignominious burial in the highway with a stake driven through his body. 4 Bl. Com. 189. But, aside from the mental suffering which might thus be inflicted upon innocent surviving relatives of the suicide by a dese-

Case Note.—Attempt to commit suicide as a crime:—The foregoing opinion, which otherwise embodies a complete review of the subject, overlooks the case of State v. Carney, 69 N. J. L. 478, 55 Atl. 44, holding that an attempt at suicide is an indictable offense in New Jersey. The court in the latter case distinguishes the Massachusetts cases cited in the opinion in MAY v. PENNELL upon the ground that the common-law offense had been repealed by implication by the Massachusetts statute. It is obvious that this ground of distinction also applies to MAY v. PENNELL. The New Jersey court pointed out that, while there is no independent enactment in New Jersey making an attempt at suicide a crime, its statute does declare that all offenses of an indictable nature at common law, and not otherwise provided for by the act of the legislature, shall be misdemeanors and punishable accordingly.

Assuming that punishment by forfeiture of property and ignominious burial, prescribed by the common law for suicide, has been abolished in New Jersey as well as in Massachusetts, the New Jersey case is still distinguishable from the Massachusetts cases for the reason that the New Jersey statute with respect to attempts does not, like the Massachusetts statute, impliedly limit indictable attempts to cases in which the attempt, if unsuccessful, would have constituted, not merely a criminal offense, but a punishable offense. The mere fact that suicide may be regarded as a crime, or at least criminal, it not being a punishable offense, is obviously insufficient to bring an attempt to commit suicide within the Massachusetts statute, which in this respect is the same as the Maine statute defining indictable attempts.

eration of his body, it was not in the power of human tribunals to impose any other punishment than the forfeiture of his estate; and "since forfeitures for crime are not practised in our states," says Mr. Bishop, "suicide is not practically an offense with us." 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 512; 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 1187. No case has been brought to the attention of the court in which it has been held in any of the United States that suicide is a punishable offense. Although it may be deemed ethically reprehensible and inconsistent with the public welfare, it has never been declared by the legislature, or held by the court of this state, to be such a public wrong as will subject the doer to legal punishment. Section 1 of chapter 136 of the Revised Statutes declares that, "when no punishment is provided by statute, a person convicted of an offense shall be imprisoned for less than one year or fined not exceeding $500. "But, even if suicide is deemed to be criminal as malum in se, neither of the penalties specified in this statute can be inflicted upon one whose life is ended.

Nor is there any statute in this state which constitutes an attempt to commit suicide a substantive offense, or makes it subject to legal punishment. Section 9, chap. 132, Rev. Stat., provides as follows: "Whoever attempts to commit an offense, and does anything towards it, but fails, or is interrupted, or is prevented, in its execution, where no punishment is expressly provided for such attempt, shall, if the offense thus attempted is punishable with imprisonment for life, be imprisoned for not less than one, nor more than ten, years; and in all other cases he shall receive the same kind of punishment that might have been inflicted if the offense attempted had been committed, but not exceeding one half thereof." But here, again, it is obvious that cases of suicide were not within the contemplation of the legislature in the enactment of this statute. As no penalty of any kind is attached to suicide if actually committed, there could be no punishment whatever by force of this statute for an attempt to commit it.

In the absence of any statute in this state expressly making an attempt to commit suicide a punishable offense, it is therefore difficult to discover any satisfactory ground upon which the sentence in this case can rest; for it would appear to be a palpable solecism in the law to declare that a mere attempt to commit an act which is not penal is itself punishable.

It is suggested, however, that, inasmuch as suicide was a "species of felony" by the common law of England, and an attempt to commit suicide was there held to be a misdemeanor, it became incorporated in the common law of Massachusetts as a substantive offense, and in this state is subject to the provisions of § 1, chap. 136, Rev. Stat., above quoted, declaring that, "when no punishment is provided by statute, a person convicted of an offense shall be imprisoned for less than one year, or fined," etc.

The only English cases that have been cited in any of the text-books or cyclopædias as authority for the doctrine that an attempt to commit suicide was a misdemeanor by the common law of England, are Reg. v. Doody, 6 Cox, C. C. 463, and Reg. v. Burgess, 9 Cox, C. C. 247. The former case is simply the report of a nisi prius ruling at a trial in which the prisoner was not defended by counsel. In the latter case the defendant pleaded guilty, and the question reserved for the court of criminal appeals was primarily one of jurisdiction. It was contended in behalf of the defendant that an attempt to commit suicide was an attempt to commit murder within the meaning of chapter 100, Stat. 24 & 25 Vict., and hence was not within the jurisdiction of the county assizes; but the court held that, though suicide was deemed a felony in England, it was not murder within the meaning of the act named, and that the attempt to commit suicide was a misdemeanor and within the jurisdiction of that court; but sentence was respited.

"An attempt," says Mr. Bishop, "is an intent to do a particular thing which the law, either common or statutory, has declared to be a crime, coupled with an act toward the doing [of it]" (1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 728); while "a substantive felony is one depending on itself alone, and not on another felony to be first established by the conviction of the direct doer" (1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 696). It is not claimed that the attempt to commit suicide was ever made a substantive offense by any act of the British Parliament, and there is no suggestion in the brief oral utterances of the judges in the English cases above cited that the misdemeanor of which the defendant was in each instance there convicted was other than the ordinary attempt to commit a punishable felony. It is not suggested that it was a substantive offense by the law of England. If the accomplished act of suicide had not there been a punishable crime, the attempt to commit the act could not have been held to be a punishable misdemeanor. For it has been seen that an attempt involves an "intent to do a particular thing which the law declares to be a crime," and the word "crime" or "offense," as ordinarily used in legislative enactments, by text writers on criminal law, and in the practical administration of it by the courts, uniformly signifies a public wrong which subjects the perpetrator to legal punishment. Standard Dict.; 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, 32. In accordance with this view is the statement of Mr. Bishop, as above shown, that suicide is "not practically an offense with us." But an attempt to commit an act which is not "practically a crime" is not itself "practically criminal," because not punishable. In Massachusetts forfeitures were abolished by the "Body of Liberties" of 1641, the statute providing for an ignominious burial of the suicide fell into disuse at the close of that century, and the colony act of 1660 was repealed in 1823. Thus the common law of England upon this subject was modified in Massachusetts, and suicide ceased to be a punishable offense. The ground work for the English doctrine that an attempt to commit it was a misdemeanor was thus removed. If it was a misdemeanor by the common law of England, it ceased to be such under the law of Massachusetts, and has never been recognized as a part of the common law of Maine. "Reason is the soul of the law," says Lord Coke, "and when the reason changes the law also changes." [Milborn's Case] 7 Coke, 7. Although there have been attempts to commit suicide in great numbers in the history of both Massachusetts and Maine, in no instance which this court has been able to discover has there been a conviction of such an attempt before any court prior to the case at bar.

In Com. v. Dennis, 105 Mass. 162, it was distinctly held that an attempt to commit suicide was not an indictable offense in that commonwealth; but the decision rests upon the construction of their statutes, which, however, are in substance and effect precisely like our own. In the opinion the court says: "In this commonwealth the whole matter of punishments for all attempts to commit an offense prohibited by law, when no express provision is otherwise made, has been subject to revision by statute." After stating the provision of the statute, in terms like § 9, chap. 132, of our Revised Statutes, above quoted, the court adds: "The attempt to commit suicide is thus left without punishment, because the act itself could never be punished by any of the modes stated. By a well-established rule of the construction of statutes, the common law is held to be repealed by implication, when the whole subject has been revised by the legislature. Com. v. Cooley, 10 Pick. 37; Com. v. Marshall, 11 Pick. 350, 22 Am. Dec. 377; Lakin v. Lakin, 2 Allen, 45. This rule requires us to look to the statute alone for the punishment, if any, affixed to the act here indictated. If it is not there made punishable, it is enough, whatever the reason which induced its omission. The end of punishment is the prevention of crime, and it may have been thought at least impolitic to punish an attempt to do that which is itself dispunishable, when the direct effect of the penalty must be to increase the secrecy and efficiency of the means employed to accomplish the end proposed."

It is true that in Com. v. Mink, 123 Mass. 422, 25 Am. Rep. 109, it was held that suicide must still be deemed criminal as malum in se, and, although an attempt to commit it is not punishable, yet a person who, in attempting to commit it, accidentally kills another, who is trying to prevent its accomplishment, is guilty of manslaughter. But Chief Justice Gray, who drew the opinion in the latter case, appears to have concurred in the former, and expressly states in his opinion that the conclusion reached in Com. v. Mink is not affected by the fact that "the legislature, having in the general revisions of the statutes measured the degree of punishment for attempts to commit offenses by the punishment prescribed for each offense if actually committed, has intentionally or inadvertently left the attempt to commit suicide without punishment, because the completed act would not be punished in any manner,"—citing the former case of Com. v. Dennis, supra.

The question arose under the Penal Code of Hawaii in 1868, upon a demurrer to an indictment for an attempt to commit suicide, and the demurrer was sustained and the indictment quashed. In the opinion of the court published in King v. Ahsee, 2 Am. Law Rev. 794, Chief Justice Allen says, in conclusion: "The wisdom of legislative bodies has never deemed it wise to make a provision to apply to the act charged against the defendant, and we are of opinion that we should be slow to give an entirely new construction to the Code concerning murder, and to impose a punishment never contemplated, and of the wisdom of which the framers of the law have not as yet expressed a favorable opinion. . . . We find, however, no statute of any country, nor any provision of the common law, which will sustain this indictment."

By § 178 of the Penal Code of New York, however, enacted in 1881. "every person guilty of attempting suicide is guilty of felony, punishable by imprisonment in a state prison not exceeding two years or by a fine not exceeding $1,000," although no forfeiture is imposed in the case of the "successful perpetrator." These sections of the New York Code are incorporated in the Codes of North and South Dakota. But these provisions appear to have fallen into utter disuse; for we have been unable to find any reported convictions for this offense in either state since the adoption of this Code. And, although there have doubtless been innumerable attempts to commit suicide in the United States, no instance has been discovered in which there has ever been a conviction for this offense, on either statutory or common-law grounds, prior to that in the case at bar.

It is accordingly the opinion of the court that an attempt to commit suicide is not an indictable offense in this state, and that the entry should be—

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

ORLANDO MASON et al.,

v.

BAXTER D. WHITNEY, Appt.

(— Mass. —, 78 N. E. 881.)

Water—flow of stream—working hours.

1. The mere fact that for a long period of time it has been the custom of the owners of mills along a stream to run them only during the working hours of the day, by reason of which the lower owners have gratuitously received the benefit of the pond of an upper mill owner which stored the water of the stream during the idle hours and let it all down during the working hours, does not give them a right to insist on his continuance of such practice, so as to prevent his running his wheels throughout the twenty-four hours.

Same—joint action.

2. The rights of lower mill owners on a stream are not enlarged by suing jointly to restrain the owner of an upper pond from running his wheels throughout the twenty-four hours, thereby depriving them of the benefit of his storage reservoir.

Same—reasonable use.

3. It is not unreasonable for a mill owner, if his own interest requires it, to use the water of the stream in his business, nights as well as days, so long as he leaves the natural flow of the water unobstructed and undiminished during the ordinary working hours of the day; and this is true, although those using the water above him send down most of it during the daytime.

Same—stored water.

4. The additional daily flow due to the storage of water during a wet season, to be let down during a dry one, is to be treated as part of the natural flow, in determining the right of a lower mill owner in reference to the use of other mill owners further down the stream.

Case Note.—Right to use stream for power during the night as well as during the day:—The above decision is a material contribution to the law in holding that the rights of mill owners upon the stream are governed by its natural flow, and not by the artificial use which has been ordinarily made of the stream by the mill owners. As shown by 2 Farnham, Waters, 1612, the cases which have dealt with the rights of mill owners to the flow of the stream have usually been those in which the use complained of was an intermittent, and not a continuous, use. That author states that there is no ground of complaint on the part of the lower millowner merely because the flow is not regular, if the pond from which the flow comes does not so far exceed the capacity of the stream and the other ponds that they are rendered useless. But the intermittent flow must be based upon some reason, and be proportionate to the necessities of the mill for the use of which the pond is made. But it seems to be established that, since the interests of the riparian owners require the use of water chiefly in the daytime, the upper owner has no right to hold the water back in the daytime and let it down at night. Barrett v. Parsons, 10 Cush. 367; Beavers v. Trimmer, 25 N. J. L. 97. And in Hoyt v. Cline, 39 N. Y. S. R. 937, 15 N. Y. Supp. 337, it was held that an injunction would lie to restrain the upper owner from retaining the natural flow of the water during working hours and discharging it in floods into the stream during nights and Sundays, at times when the lower mill owner could not use it, for the sole purpose of annoying and injuring him. So, the withholding of waters of an irrigation stream during the day, and discharging them during the night, when they cannot be utilized by lower owners, causing injury to crops and cattle, will sustain a right of action. Lone Tree Ditch Co. v. Rapid City Electric & Gaslight Co. 16 S. D. 451, 93 N. W. 650. And a malicious interference with the flow of the stream, by holding it up during the daytime and letting it down at night, for the purpose of injuring the lower proprietor, will sustain an action for damages. Twiss v. Baldwin, 9 Conn. 291. But the right to use it during the night instead of the day might be acquired by custom, if the rule would best secure the general rights of the parties in interest. Keeney & W. Mfg. Co. v. Union Mfg. Co. 39 Conn. 577. Conversely, water may be stored at night and used exclusively in the daytime if the mill is suited to the capacity of the stream, although the effect is to interrupt the flow of the stream while the reservoir is filling, and the owner of a mill below requires continuous flow of water night and day. Bullard v. Saratoga Victory Mfg. Co. 77 N. Y. 525, Affirming 13 Hun, 43. Since, by the construction of a pond proportionate to the size of the stream, the lower APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Superior Court for Worcester County in complainants' favor in a suit to enjoin the alleged wrongful interference with the flow of water in a stream. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank Bulkeley Smith, T. H. Gage, Jr., and Frank F. Dresser, for appellant:

The benefit of a storage reservoir, arising from the "fact that the natural flow of the stream is affected by the ordinary use of a reservoir above, cannot enlarge" the plaintiffs' rights against the defendant.

Brady v. Blackinton, 113 Mass. 245; Lake-side Mfg. Co. v. Worcester, 186 Mass. 552, 72 N. E. 81; Drake v. Hamilton Woolen Co. 99 Mass. 574; Whitney v. Wheeler Cotton Mills, 151 Mass. 396, 7 L.R.A. 613, 24 N. E. 774; Whittier v. Cochecho Mfg. Co. 9 N. H. 454, 32 Am. Dec. 382.

The owner of the upper privilege may make a reasonable use of the water, and obstruct and accumulate it in a reasonable way for the benefit of his own mill, whatever may be the effect on the owner below.

Whitney v. Wheeler Cotton Mills, supra; Tourtellot v. Phelps, 4 Gray, 370; Gould v. Boston Duck Co. 13 Gray, 451; Wamesit Power Co. v. Sterling Mills, 158 Mass. 448, 33 N. E. 503; Hazard Powder Co. v. Somersville Mfg. Co. 78 Conn. 171, 61 Atl. 519; Drake v. Hamilton Woolen Co. and Whittier v. Cochecho Mfg. Co. supra; Weare v. Chase, 93 Me. 264, 44 Atl. 900; Brace v. Yale, 4 Allen, 393.

Evidence of custom and usage is admitted, not to control or in any way affect the natural flow of the stream, but solely and simply to show what is a reasonable use of the flow of the stream.

Hazard Powder Co. v. Somersville Mfg. Co. and Gould v. Boston Duck Co. supra.

A riparian owner is not entitled to an intermittent flow.

Hamor v. Bar Harbor Water Co. 92 Me. 364, 42 Atl. 790.

Messrs. Parker & Milton, Henry H. Fuller, and George A. Gaskill for appellees.

Knowlton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On Millers river in the town of Winchendon, within a distance of less than 2 miles, are six mill privileges, each occupied for manufacturing purposes. Altogether they have a head and fall for the use of water power on their several wheels, which amounts to 98½ feet. The defendant owns the upper privilege, each of the parties plaintiff owns one of the others, and one is owned by persons who are not connected with this suit. The defendant's mills are near the head of the valley. They have a fall of 20 feet, with a mill pond covering 110 acres, containing 5,000,000 cubic feet of water for 1 foot in depth of the pond, this being something more than the entire flow of the stream for twenty-four hours. They have been used since 1846, in part for a machine shop, and in part as a cotton factory, and lately as a machine shop and a power house to furnish electricity to light the town of Winchendon. The mills of the several plaintiffs have been used still longer for different kinds of manufacturing. The valley is narrow, and descends rapidly from the defendant's mills to the westward. "The plaintiffs' mills have no substantial storage capacity in the respective mill ponds. It is only sufficient for from two to four hours' use when there is no inflow." The defendant maintains and uses, in connection with his mill, a large reservoir some miles up the stream on one of its branches, and the mill owner next above him maintains and uses two other reservoirs above his pond on the other branch of the stream. The master finds and the plaintiffs concede, what is clear upon the evidence, that no one of the parties has acquired any rights by prescription. The defendant's use of the water at his mills has always been such as he has found most convenient for his own purposes, and there is no foundation for a claim of use adverse to him.

For a long time prior to June, 1899, the usual hours for operating all of these establishments were from 7 A. M. to 6 P. M., with an hour's interval at noon. At an earlier period the mills ran eleven hours, and in all the years, from time to time when business was pressing, they were operated overtime during a part of the hours of the night. Since June, 1899, the defendant has used one of his two wheels ten hours per day for his machine shop, and the other, for a considerable part of each night, in producing electricity for lighting the town of Winchendon. From a lack of storage capacity in their ponds, much of the water used for this latter purpose has not owner may regulate the flow to suit himself, and maintain it evenly throughout the twenty-four hours; and since each riparian owner has an equal right in the stream, and each may make a reasonable use of the water,—the test to be applied in every case is whether or not the use is reasonable in view of all the circumstances. Applying 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

this test, it would seem that a use which was continuous and uniform throughout the twenty-four hours could not be held to be unreasonable, since, as suggested by the court in MASON v. WHITNEY, the lower proprietors, by the use of ponds, could utilize the water the same as though the upper mill did not exist.

been utilized by the plaintiffs, and they have not been able to have the entire flow of the stream for twenty-four hours come to their wheels during the ten hours which constitute their ordinary working day. This bill is brought to recover for their loss, and to obtain an injunction against a continuance by the defendant of this use.

The plaintiffs proceed upon the theory that, because of the custom and usage of mill owners on this stream, even though no prescriptive rights have been acquired, they are legally entitled to have the water come down from the defendant's mills in such a way that, without mill ponds of their own sufficient to retain any considerable amount of water, they can use the whole flow of the stream for a day of twenty-four hours, during the ten hours of the day in which they find it convenient to operate their machinery. The master has adopted this theory. The defendant made many requests for rulings in matters of law, touching this subject, which were refused or modified by the master. The defendant's request for a ruling that the natural flow of the stream may be used "in any reasonable manner required for the operation and propulsion of works of such character and magnitude as are adapted and appropriate to the size of the stream," the master gave with the qualification that, "in the case of ancient mills, dependent on a flow which has been established by custom and use and the wants of the community, the upper proprietor must exercise his right to the use of the water with a just regard to a like reasonable use of it by the proprietors of mills immediately below, as those rights have been established by custom and usage, and the wants of the community." The fifth request was that, "so long as the upper proprietor uses the water in a reasonable and lawful manner, and in the way best fitted to his needs and interests, he does not, by such mere user, lose any rights by prescription, and can, if a change in user becomes advantageous to him, alter and modify his user, so long as he does not impair thereby the natural flow of the stream." This the master modified by inserting after the word "interests," the words "in the absence of any acquired rights in the lower proprietors, arising out of long-established custom and usage and the wants of the community," and by adding, at the end, the words, "unless the flow has been established by long custom and usage." The thirteenth request was as follows: "If the plaintiffs have any rights in the defendant's user other than the rights common to all riparian proprietors, they must show that such rights have been gained by prescription." To this the master added the words, "or by custom or usage extending over more than twenty years. The nature of the custom and usage established in this case appears in the body of the report." In reference to the eighteenth request, the master says, "I have based my findings on a custom and usage adopted and carried out for many years by both the plaintiffs and the defendant." In dealing with other requests, and in other parts of his report, the master refers to an established custom and usage of the plaintiffs and the defendant, in their use of this stream, which has changed the rights common to riparian proprietors upon similar streams and limited the rights which the defendant would otherwise have to a use of the water for power. This, too, when it is found and conceded that no rights have been acquired or lost by prescription. The application of the law by the master is such that the plaintiffs are now held entitled, as against the defendant, to have his mill and pond and reservoir so managed that the entire flow of the river for the twenty-four hours shall come to their mills during the ten hours of the day when they wish to run their wheels, while if it were not for the dams and reservoirs of the defendant and another proprietor further up the stream, the water would flow regularly night and day, so that during the fourteen hours of each day when their mills are not running, the plaintiffs would lose much of the flow from lack of storage capacity in their ponds. The result would be that, without having acquired any prescriptive rights, the plaintiffs could compel these upper proprietors to interrupt the natural flow of the stream every day, and retain the water until the time when the plaintiffs wished to use it.

This is a mistaken view of the law. In the absence of any prescriptive rights, the plaintiffs have no greater right against the defendant, in reference to his use of the stream, than they would have if his mills and dams and reservoir and their mills and dams had been built and used but a single month. In the latter case each would have a right to a reasonable use of the water. In determining what is reasonable for each of the parties, the nature of the stream and of the several mill privileges, its adaptability to different modes of use, the wants of the community, the custom and usage of people in the neighborhood and elsewhere in regard to the management of business, the hours of labor and the use of the water of such streams, would all be proper matters for consideration as evidence. Tourtellott v. Phelps, 4 Gray, 370; Gould v. Boston Duck Co. 13 Gray, 443, 451, 453; Whitney v. Wheeler Cotton Mills, 151 Mass. 390, 7 L.R.A. 613, 24 N. E. 774; Hazard Powder

Co. v. Somersville Mfg. Co. 78 Conn. 171, 61 Atl. 519. In the absence of rights by prescription, the only difference in the determination of such a question, between a case when the mills are all new and a case when the mills have all been running sixty years, is that, in dealing with old mills the evidence of custom and usage as to hours of labor or the methods of doing business, which in either case would include the practice of the whole community in such matters, would be enlarged by taking in, with the rest, the practice of the half dozen owners on this stream. So far as it concerns the issue in this case, there is nothing to indicate that, for the last fifty years, there has been anything different in the experience of these men from that of men and property owners generally, engaged in like pursuits. So, upon custom and usage, the material evidence would doubtless be substantially the same if the mills were new as it is now. If the plaintiffs have enjoyed gratuitously the benefit of the defendant's dam and reservoir for the storage of water for their wheels, that is not a circumstance which gives them a right to have it in like manner in the future, or which deprives him of the right to use the stream now as he could use it if his works on the stream were all new. Nor does it make it less reasonable for him to use the water now according to his interest.

So too, the rights of these plaintiffs are not enlarged by their suing jointly. The question as to each is whether the defendant is using the water unreasonably to his detriment. If the defendant were not using it at all,—if he and one or two proprietors further up should abandon their mills and take away their dams and open their reservoirs, so that the water would come down to the plaintiffs' mills in its natural flow, in the same quantity in all parts of each day of twenty-four hours,—it seems very plain that the plaintiffs would have no legal ground of complaint, although they would be able to use on their wheels, during each working day of ten hours, very much less water than they use now.

The question of chief difficulty in the case is: How far is it reasonable for a mill owner on such a stream to use the water in the nighttime, for a legitimate business which calls for power during that part of the day, although in most kinds of business power is used not more than ten hours in a day? It is a familiar fact that certain industries cannot be conducted profitably without a use of power in the nighttime. This is true of paper manufacturing, which is an important industry in Massachusetts, of producing electricity for lighting and for the use of street railways, of powder manufacturing, and of some other kinds of business. All kinds of legitimate business are alike entitled to the protection of the law. This is recognized in the cases which show a use of water power in the nighttime, to the detriment of proprietors who wish to use it only in the daytime. Barrett v. Parsons, 10 Cush. 367; Bullard v. Saratoga Victory Mfg. Co. 77 N. Y. 525; Keeney & W. Mfg. Co. v. Union Mfg. Co. 39 Conn. 576; Hazard Powder Co. v. Somersville Mfg. Co. supra.

The primary right of every riparian proprietor is to have the natural and customary flow of the stream, without obstruction or change. This primary right is modified by the right of every proprietor to make a reasonable use of the water, which leaves the lower proprietor the natural flow, changed, so far as it may be, by such previous use on the stream above. If such use makes the flow more advantageous for the lower proprietor than the flow in its strictly natural state, he gets the benefit of it, as an incident of his ownership, which he may enjoy while it lasts, but not as permanent property that he can control for the future. The fact that a reasonable use by an upper proprietor leaves the flow more beneficial than the strictly natural flow to those on the stream below, may well be considered as a circumstance, so long as the condition remains, in determining what is a reasonable use for an intermediate proprietor, in reference to those further down. In this way a reservoir, reasonably constructed and used in connection with a stream, may so far affect the stream below as properly to be taken into account in passing upon the conduct of lower riparian proprietors.

We have been referred to no adjudication, and after searching we have found none, that determines how far a proprietor, under a claim of a reasonable use, may change the natural flow of a stream by appropriating its waters in the nighttime and holding them back in the daytime. In Barrett v. Parsons, 10 Cush. 367-372, the judge left to the jury the question whether the defendant had "used the water in a reasonable and proper manner for the regular prosecution of his business, . . . [or] had used it unreasonably, wantonly, and unnecessarily, by running his mill at unusual and unreasonable hours, and holding back the water and letting it down to the plaintiffs' works at improper times of the day and night, so that the plaintiffs were thereby deprived of the reasonable, ordinary, and proper use of their mills." The defendant had used his gristmill a great deal in the nighttime, and had let down to the plaintiffs but little water in the daytime. A detention of water in the nighttime and an increased use of it in the daytime has often been held to be reasonable, even when it affected unfavorably a particular proprietor below. This is because it is in accordance with the usual and convenient method of transacting most kinds of manufacturing business. But reversing the method would be detrimental to the interests of most lower riparian proprietors. In all the five cases last above cited, the decision was adverse to the contention of mill owners that they could lawfully change the natural flow of a stream by using the water nights and holding it back days, to the damage of owners below. But we are of opinion that it is not unreasonable for a mill owner, if his interest requires it, to use the water of his stream in his business nights as well as days, so long as he leaves the natural flow of the stream unobstructed and undiminished during the ordinary working hours of the day. If an upper proprietor maintains, for his own purposes, a reservoir for the storage of water that falls in the wet season, to be let down into the stream in times of low water, and in such times increases the flow by letting down water, the additional quantity that so comes each day may be treated as a part of the natural flow for the twenty-four hours in determining the rights of a lower mill owner in reference to the use of other mill owners further down the stream. But the mill owner ought not to be under an obligation, against his own interest, to hold back water in the nighttime in order to enable his neighbor below to use it more profitably the next day. The lower proprietor is "entitled only to a natural flow, not to an intermittent flow." Weare v. Chase, 93 Me. 264-272, 44 Atl. 900, 902. We think this too plain for doubt where the stream comes to the upper proprietor with its strictly natural flow unchanged by any use above. If there is a use above which usually sends down to him most of the water in the daytime, the subject takes on difficulties. Does reasonable conduct require him to forego his own interest, in order to give the proprietor below something better than the natural flow of the stream, because it comes to him changed, in a way that would be beneficial to the lower proprietor? The general statement of the law in the decisions indicates that, in the absence of special rights acquired by grant or prescription, a riparian proprietor is entitled to nothing more or better than the natural flow of the stream. If he wishes to use all the water during a part of the day, he may provide for himself storage, or otherwise adapt his works to the conditions. We are 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of opinion that it is not unreasonable for a mill owner, even if the water above him is all used in the daytime, to use a part of it in his business in the nighttime, provided he leaves as much as the regular natural flow of the stream, unaffected by use, to pass by at all times during the ordinary business hours of the day. We do not say, as a matter of law, that there may not be conditions which would make it reasonable to increase or diminish such a use in the nighttime. But under the conditions that appear in this case, we think this a correct statement of what is reasonable between the parties.

Inasmuch as the use of the defendant's reservoir on the stream above is a part of his use of the stream at his mills for his own convenience, we think his entire use at the mills and at the reservoir should be considered together, in its effect upon the natural flow to the plaintiffs below, in determining the limits of the defendant's rights. That part of his use which is detrimental and that part which is beneficial to the plaintiffs, when taken together, will show how far he can go in the use of the water without invading their rights. Elliot v. Fitchburg R. Co. 10 Cush. 191-197, 57 Am. Dec. 85.

It is unnecessary to consider in detail the numerous exceptions that were taken. The principles above stated will enable the parties to determine their rights.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT. (Division 1.)

SUSIE B. HARRISON, Respt.,
v.
KANSAS CITY ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY, Appt.

(195 Mo. 606, 93 S. W. 951.)

Electricity—grounding current.

1. An electric light company is negligent in turning the current upon a circuit upon which it has known that the wire

Case Note.—Liability for negligence with respect to electric current as affected by concurring negligence of third person:

—The rule governing liability for negligence as affected by the concurring negligence of a third party is well stated by the court in its opinion in HARRISON v. KANSAS CITY ELECTRIC LIGHT CO. with reference to liability for injuries caused by an electric current, as follows: "If a defendant is negligent, and his negligence combines with that of another, or with any other independent intervening cause, he is was grounded, without positively knowing that the trouble has been remedied, where the means to ascertain that fact are within its reach and at hand.

Master—imputed negligence of servant.

2. The negligence of the lineman of an electric light company in reporting that a circuit upon which a wire had been grounded, and which he had been sent to clear, was cleared, without having remedied the trouble, is imputable to the company.

Electricity—concurrent negligence—liability.

3. An electric light company which negligently turns a current on to a circuit having a grounded wire cannot escape liability for resulting injury to a person coming in contact with the grounded current by the fact that the injury would not have occurred except for the act of a stranger in making a second ground at another place.

Same—duty of company.

4. An electric light company cannot escape liability for the death of a person who innocently came in contact with its grounded current upon his own premises, upon the theory that it owed him no duty.

Same—proximate cause.

5. An electric light company which negligently permits its current to be grounded cannot escape liability for the death of one who innocently comes in contact with it at a point where a stranger has made another ground, on the theory that the particular injury could not have been anticipated by any reasonable man.

Instruction—assumption.

6. An instruction is not erroneous in liable although his negligence was not the sole negligence, or the sole proximate cause, and although his negligence, without such other independent, intervening cause, would not have produced the injury."

The following cases illustrate the various applications of this doctrine:

A telephone company and an electric light company were both held liable in Horning v. Hudson River Teleph. Co. 111 App. Div. 122, 97 N. Y. Supp. 625, in which a fireman, in the performance of his duties, was required to remove from a lane, through which the fire engine must pass, an abandoned telephone wire which the telephone company had negligently failed to support, and was injured by an electric current transmitted into the telephone wire from an unguarded and uninsulated electric-light wire. The evidence showed that insulation and a guard wire over the electric-light wire, if kept in good condition, would have prevented the transmission of the current into the telephone wire.

And in City Electric Street R. Co. v. Conery, 61 Ark. 381, 31 L.R.A. 570, 54 Am. St. Rep. 262, 33 S. W. 426, the jury found the owners of both wires guilty of negligence,—the owner of the telephone wire in permitting that to fall and remain down, and the owner of the trolley wire in allowing the telephone wire to become charged with electricity by contact with the trolley wire. The court says: "The injury was the result 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

assuming, in an action for injury by a grounded electric-light current, that two grounds existed, when it was conceded by both parties that to cause an accident two grounds must have existed, and the accident was established.

Same—permitting jury to determine proximate cause.

7. An instruction is not erroneous, in an action for negligent killing, as requiring the jury to determine the proximate cause of death, which informs them that, if the diversion of an electric current was the proximate cause of the death, then defendant is liable, where they have been told the facts necessary to create liability, so that a verdict for plaintiff would merely announce that such facts existed from which the law imposes the liability.

Evidence—erroneous admission—curing error.

8. Upon discovering an error in the admission of evidence, the court need not discharge the jury and award a new trial, but may cure the error by instructing the jury to disregard the testimony.

Same—improved appliances—nonprejudicial error.

9. The admission of evidence in an action against an electric light company for the death of a person because of grounded current, that there were means by which the grounded portion might have been cut out, is not prejudicial, where the company had, before turning the current into the circuit containing the ground, concluded that the ground was not located there, so that of the concurring negligence of the two parties, and would not have occurred in the absence of either. In that case the negligence of the two was the proximate cause of the same, and both parties are liable."

Similar decisions were rendered in the following cases, in which unprotected or negligently strung telephone wires came in contact with uninsulated or unguarded trolley or electric light wires, owned or controlled by a separate company, thereby causing injuries. McKay v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 111 Ala. 337, 31 L.R.A. 589, 56 Am. St. Rep. 59, 19 So. 695; Jones v. Finch, 128 Ala. 217, 29 So. 182; Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Ware, 115 Ky. 581, 74 S. W. 289; Economy Light & P. Co. v. Hiller, 203 Ill. 518, 68 N. E. 72; United Electric R. Co. v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 423, 24 Am. St. Rep. 614, 14 S. W. 863; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. State, 82 Md. 293, 31 L.R.A. 572, 51 Am. St. Rep. 404, 33 Atl. 763.

The facts that a telephone company strung its wires above those of an electric light company, already in place, and took no steps to guard against the possibility of the wires coming into contact with each other at the crossing point; and that it strung its wires so loosely and negligently that one of them fell in a storm upon an uninsulated wire below, causing it to burn in two, one end falling into the street, so that a pedestrian came into contact with it

It would not have made use of such appliances had they been part of its equipment. Same—admissibility.

10. In an action against an electric light company for injuries caused by a grounded current evidence is not admissible that appliances existed which would enable it to cut out the grounded portion and turn the current into the remainder of the circuit, since it is not bound to adopt any particular appliance, but is required to have the appliances which it does adopt reasonably safe.

Imputed negligence.

11. The act of a boy in wrongfully grounding an electric-light current is not imputable to his father, so as to prevent a recovery against the electric company in case the father is killed by innocently coming in contact with the current, which the company negligently turns onto the circuit without employing means in its control to ascertain whether or not the ground which it has known to exist has been remedied.

St. Rep. 505, 35 So. 731, to be no excuse to the electric light company for not keeping its wires well covered with insulation, since the falling of the telephone wire on the wire below would have been attended with no disaster but for the uninsulated condition of the latter.

The fact that a telephone company may have been negligent in leaving one of its wires suspended in a dangerous manner was held, in Kankakee Electric R. Co. v. Whittemore, 45 Ill. App. 484, to constitute no defense to an electric railway company, in an action for damages for the death of a horse by a charge of electricity from the telephone wire, which had been broken through the negligence of a conductor of one of the company's cars in allowing a trolley pole to fly up against it.

Where two electric light companies by contract used the same poles, which were owned by one of them, and a lineman of the lessee company was killed by contact with a live wire of the other company which it had negligently failed to insulate, the latter company cannot escape liability on the ground of the negligence of the lessee company in failing to turn off the current, which it had the right and opportunity to do. Standard Light & P. Co. v. Muncey, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 416, 76 S. W. 931. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Persons who, for their own private gain or profit, send the dangerous agency, electricity, out into the streets and alleys of a city, are bound to use the utmost care in preventing the escape from the wires of the electrical current to the injury of others.

Such persons are bound to use the utmost care in inspecting the wires carrying the electrical current, and to remove or remedy any defects thereon, no matter how created, or by whose fault or act.

Geismann v. Missouri-Edison Electric Co.

And the failure of an electric light company to have its wires properly insulated was held, in San Antonio Gas & Electric Co. v. Speegle (Tex. Civ. App.) 60 S. W. 884, to be a concurring cause of an injury to a lineman of a telephone company, caused by the breaking of a wire of the latter company which he was taking down, and which fell across an uninsulated light wire, thereby rendering the electric light company liable, though, but for the defect in the wire which broke, the accident would not have happened.

A city owning an uninsulated patrol wire, fastened above electric-light wires to poles erected by an electric light company, which was not protected with guard wires, was liable to be brought into contact with the light wires by the swaying of the limbs of trees, had no supports except the insulators on the poles, and which had not been in use for about a year, was held liable, in Twist v. Rochester, 37 App. Div. 307, 55 N. Y. Supp. 850, Affirmed in 165 N. Y. 619, 59 N. E. 1131, for the death of a boy who came in contact with a broken end of such wire, which was charged with a deadly current derived from the electric-light wires, although the injury would not have occurred but for the negligence of an employee of the electric light company in pulling the patrol wire down over the street.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action under the statute for $5,000 damages for the death of plaintiff's husband, on the 24th of April, 1902, caused by an electric shock from the defendant's wire in Kansas City, Missouri. The action is by the widow. A prior action had been brought by the widow within six months after the death, in which the plaintiff suffered a nonsuit, and this action was brought within one year thereafter, as allowed by the statute. There was a judgment for the plaintiff for $5,000, and the defendant appealed.

The issues:

The petition alleges the relation of the plaintiff to the deceased, and his death on the day stated, the fact of such prior suit, nonsuit, and the institution of this action within the statutory time, the incorporation of the defendant; that it owned a certain electric power house and electric-light circuits connected therewith in Kansas City, used by it for the purpose of lighting the streets of said city; that it was the duty of the defendant to maintain and operate the same, as far as ordinary and reasonable care would avail therefor so that the same should be in a reasonably safe condition and not liable to endanger lives and property of others. The negligence charged in the petition is as follows: "That on and for some time prior to about the 24th day of April, 1902, a certain of said arc-light circuits owned and operated by the defendant company, and known, as plaintiff is informed, as circuit No. 32, was in a dangerous and defective condition in that it was 'grounded;' that is to say, that, on account of defects in the insulation of said circuit, the wire or wires on said circuit had come into electrical contact with the earth at some place or places to plaintiff unknown, so that, upon said circuit becoming grounded at any other place or places, a heavy and dangerous volume and charge of electricity was liable to pass from said circuit to and through any person or persons who might be situated that said charge of electricity should pass through the body of such person or persons and through the earth in what is commonly known as a 'short circuit' and thereon back to said circuit through such other grounded connection or contact, to the serious or fatal injury of the person so affected, and who are liable to come into contact with the current so recklessly released and discharged from said circuit and its proper course, without knowledge or notice that said current was being so diverted and discharged. That, by reason of said circuit being so grounded on or about and prior to April 24, 1902, at some place or places to plaintiff unknown, conditions so arose that the wire of said circuit at and near the place of residence of the plaintiff and her deceased husband came in contact with trees near and adjacent and contiguous to which the defendant had carelessly strung the wire of such circuit, so as to burn said trees, including a tree upon the premises of the plaintiff and her deceased husband; that the volume of electricity passed along the wire or wires of said circuit or circuits was such as when diverted and passed through an inferior conductor, such as the wood of trees, or the human body, would, in passing through the same, burn said wood, and injure or destroy the life of such human being or beings. That, on or about the 24th day of April, 1902, the said circuit being 'grounded' as aforesaid, at some place or places to the plaintiff unknown, and other than at the place immediately hereinafter described, upon the premises of the plaintiff and her deceased husband, Harold, the infant son of the deceased, who knew nothing of the danger of electricity, having discovered that one of the trees upon the premises of the plaintiff and her deceased husband had been burned by the contact of such tree with the wires of said circuit, which was defectively and insufficiently insulated through the carelessness and negligence of the defendant in locating same, so that same was liable to abrasion and destruction, in order to save said tree from further injury, at about the hour of 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon, connected to the wire of said circuit of the defendant, at a place where same was endangering and injuring said tree through such defective insulation, a small copper wire, and continued said copper wire into contact with the ground. That upon the said tree aforesaid there was suspended a swing for the pleasure of the plaintiff's children, constructed of a hanging loop of wire cable suspended from two points of support on a limb of said trees, and supporting a wooden seat in which said children, and others, were accustomed to swing. That said wire cable, so made into said swing, was longer than was necessary for such purpose, and the loose end thereof was wound around the limb of said tree, and down to and around the trunk of said tree, before reaching the ground. That said Harold, after so connecting said copper wire, as aforesaid, conducted the same from said tree down and around the trunk of said tree, so as to bring same in contact with the wire of said cable and bring said cable into electrical contact with the wire of said circuit. That said copper wire being so conducted to and into the ground, the charge of electricity discharged from said circuit passed harmlessly along and through said wire, down and into the ground and through the ground to some other place or places to the plaintiff unknown, to where the circuit was 'grounded,' back into said circuit and through the same returned to the power house of the defendant. That about the hour of 7:25 o'clock in the evening of said day, said Harold noticed that said copper wire or the wire of said circuit of the defendant was again burning said tree where same came into contact therewith, and, in an endeavor to prevent the further injury to said tree, cut off said copper wire between the ground and said tree, so as to leave said copper wire and the said wire of said cable of which said swing was constructed in electrical contact with the wire of said circuit, but without electrical connection with the ground other than through the insufficient and poor conductor which the trunk of said tree and the roots thereof made. That almost immediately thereafter the plaintiff's deceased husband came out into said yard for the proper purpose of speaking to or associating with the children playing about the same, and, in entire ignorance of the electrical connection of the cable to said swing, as aforesaid, with said circuit of the defendant, placed his hand in contact with said cable, whereupon said Harrison became part of an electrical connection between said cable and the earth, and the circuit of the defendant, at such other place or places where same had been negligently allowed to become and remain 'grounded,' so that a powerful charge of electricity passed from the wire of said circuit adjacent to said tree, through said copper wire, the said cable and the body of said Harrison, down and into the ground and through the same, through said 'grounded' current connection elsewhere, and back into the circuit of the defendant, causing the instant death of said Harrison. That the electricity of the character generated by the defendant in said power house and discharged along and over and through the said wires of said circuits will follow what is known in electrical science as the easiest or readiest conductor in preference to a non-conductor, or some other conductor over which it is compelled to pass, with greater resistance. That the wires used by said boy Harold are among the best known conductors of electricity, and that iron wire, such as said cable, is a first-class conductor of electricity, and while said cable and wire were directly connected with the ground the electricity passed directly and harmlessly through same and into the ground, but when such copper wire was cut there was no connection except through the trunk of said tree until the person of said Harrison touched the wire of said cable, when said electricity immediately diverted itself in sufficient volume to kill said Harrison, and passed through the body of said Harrison through the ground and on as aforesaid. That the volume and character of electricity generated by defendant at said power house and discharged over and through said circuits is many times greater than the amount necessary to produce a fatal injury when discharged through the human body, all of which, as well as the tendency of said electricity to pass through the human body, if parts of the human body should come in contact with metal connected by contact with said currents, when such human body would afford the readiest conductor of said electricity to and through other conductors in a circuit through which such electricity could pass, was or should have been well known to defendant. That, long prior to the hour of 7:25 o'clock in the evening of said day, the defendant, through its officers, agents, and employees at said power house, had notice that said circuit "had been so 'grounded' that charges of electricity passing over the same were liable to be diverted and might be so diverted as to produce fatal or serious injuries to persons inadvertently coming into the course of and becoming part of the conductor in the transmission of said electricity. That, if defendant had had, as it should have had, such means and appliances as are well known to the science of electricity and to persons familiar with the operation of such power house and circuits in use at such power house, it could have promptly ascertained that said circuit had been 'grounded' and located the place or places where its said circuit was so 'grounded,' and remedied said defect and removed said dangerous condition, but, through lack of such appliances, and the carelessness of the defendant, its servants, agents, and employees, in failing to locate the places where said dangerous condition existed after it had, or should have had, notice that such dangerous conditions did exist at places on said current, such dangerous conditions were not located and remedied, but recklessly and negligently, the defendant, through its agents, servants, and employees, caused to be transmitted through and over the wires of said circuit a charge of electricity many times greater than sufficient to produce fatal injuries to a human being, whereby, and by reason of which, the plaintiff's husband met with such fatal injuries, without negligence or fault upon his part." The answer is a general denial.

The case made is this:

The defendant is an electric light company, and is engaged in the business of lighting streets and residences of Kansas City, Missouri, and Kansas City, Kansas. It had a circuit called No. 32, which was 20 miles long. Its plant in Kansas City, Missouri, was located at what was called "Turkey Creek station." That station is 3 miles from the plaintiff's residence, which was located on Tenth street, near Woodland. Circuit No. 32 is designated as a "lamp loop" to distinguish it from the main or trunk line. Turkey Creek station runs day and night, but during the daytime the electricity for lighting arc lights on the streets is not turned on, and the plant runs for the purpose of furnishing electric lights to residences and places of business. Circuit No. 32 runs in front of the plaintiff's residence, and had been erected about a year prior to the accident. The wire was strung upon poles which stood between the curbing of the street and the sidewalk. The poles were about 25 feet high. An arm ran across the top; one wire hung on one side of the pole, and one on the other. The Harrison residence stood about 23 feet back from the street. There was a large tree standing in the yard in front of the house, and about 2 feet inside of the yard fence. The branches of the tree extended out over the sidewalk, so that the ends thereof, about the size of a lead pencil, came in contact with the arc wire of said circuit. The wires were located about 12 feet from the body of the tree. The branches of the tree that came in contact with the wire by reason of their movement by the wind had rubbed the insulation off of the wire for from 2 to 6 inches. For a month or two prior to the accident, persons living in the neighborhood had observed that at the point of contact between the branches of the tree and the electric wire in front of the Harrison residence, as also at other points where similar conditions existed, sparks or flashes of light would be thrown off from the wire when the limbs of the trees were moved by the wind, and the trees, themselves, had been injured by other branches coming in contact with the wires. The deceased had a son named Harold, who was fourteen years of age, a boy of considerable intelligence and aptness and with an inclination to experiment with electricity. Prior to the accident he had rigged up an alarm bell, worked by electricity, in the barn, back of the house, and his parents knew of that fact, and knew of his electrical proclivities. About a month prior to the accident the boy conceived the idea of tapping the defendant's wire at the point where the branches of the tree came in contact with it. On the day of the accident he returned from school about 4:15 or 4:30 o'clock P. M. He took a copper wire, which was 35 feet long, that he had been using for the alarm bell, and made a hook about 1 foot long out of a piece of galvanized iron. He fastened the hook to the end of a stick; then he climbed the tree, went out on the limb, attached the hook to the defendant's electric wire at the point where the insulation was worn off, nailed a stick, to which the hook was attached, to the limb of the tree, attached the copper wire, which had no insulation on it, to the hook and wrapped the wire around the tree, ran it down into the ground, and thence along the edge of the sidewalk to a point near the front of the house. There was a swing attached to one of the limbs of the tree, the ropes of which were made of steel cable about $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch in diameter. This steel cable rope was longer than was necessary for the swing, and the loose end of it had been wrapped around the tree. The boy says that his purpose in so doing was to protect the tree from being injured by the electricity which escaped from the wire to the branch of the tree that rested against it. He says he knew the danger of undertaking to make a connection with the arc wire while the current was on, and also knew that the current was not on the wire during the daytime, nor was it on at the time he made the connection. He says he completed his scheme about 5 o'clock P. M.

During the day of the accident the defendant knew that there was trouble on this circuit No. 32, and about 2 to half-past 3, or perhaps a little later, the defendant sent out one of its linemen to find where the trouble was and to remedy it. The defendant knew that the trouble consisted in the fact that the wire was "grounded" somewhere on the line, exactly where it did not know, nor had it any means of knowing or ascertaining except by sending out a "trouble man" to locate it. The lineman took with him an instrument, called a "magneto box," for the purpose of locating where the "ground" or "grounds" existed, which caused the trouble. That instrument is attached to the wire, and is operated by a crank thereby producing a light current of electricity not sufficient to injure anyone, but enough to ring a bell. When so attached and operated, if there is a "ground," the bell will ring and indicate on which side of the box the ground exists, but will not indicate the point on the wire where the trouble is. In order to locate the exact point of trouble it is necessary for the lineman to make such experiments along the line until the point of trouble is located. The lineman left the down-town office sometime between 2 o'clock and 4:55 o'clock. He first said that it was between 2 and 3:30 o'clock, but afterwards said it was not until after the report was received that there was trouble on the circuit. He says it would take four or five, and not to exceed ten, minutes, to make each test; he further says that he made about 6 tests, covering about 2 miles and consuming about 40 minutes. He further says that he made the first test at Twelfth and Brooklyn streets, the second at Eleventh and Prospect, the next at Ninth and Prospect. These are all of the points at which he can definitely state that he made any tests. A record was kept and introduced in evidence showing at what time the report of trouble was received, and at what time the trouble was located and corrected. That report showed that the trouble was first reported at 4:55 P. M., and that the lineman reported circuit "No. 32 O. K. at 5:15 P. M." The lineman says that he never located the trouble, but that after making the tests aforesaid he concluded that the trouble was not on circuit No. 32, but was on the trunk line, and that in making his report at 5:15 that No. 32 was O. K., he meant that he had cleared the line so far as he was concerned,—that is, that the current of electricity could be turned on without injury to him, and that he did not thereby mean, necessarily, that he had located and remedied the trouble. The report further showed "All O. K. at 4:55 P. M., except No. 18-32 up town." Where No. 18 was or what was done with reference to it does not appear in the abstract of the record. The report further shows, as above indicated, "No. 32 O. K. at 5:15 P. M." After that report was received nothing further was done looking towards ascertaining whether the line was "clear" or whether the trouble had been remedied, but, without making any further tests, the current of electricity was turned on at 7:25 P. M. The testimony disclosed that the "voltage," meaning the force or pressure of the electricity, was 3,300 volts, and the "amperage," meaning the quantity of electricity sent over the wire under such pressure was $6\frac{1}{2}$ amperes, and that one fourth to one half of an ampere in quantity transmitted under a pressure of 1,000 volts or pressure is fatal to human life.

The deceased returned to his home only a few minutes before his death, say about 7 o'clock P. M. The boy, and some of his boy friends, were playing in the front yard. The deceased ordered his boy to go into the house and stay there, and told the other boys to go home. It had been raining that day and was quite damp. After going into the house his boy again went out in the front yard. About ten minutes before the accident, the boy noticed that the electricity had been turned on, and that the light at Tenth and Woodland was burning, though not as brightly as usual. He further noticed that the tree aforesaid commenced to burn. The boys who had been ordered away called his attention to the fact that the tree was burning. He caught hold of the wire to pull it down, and it shocked him. He then went around the house and got an ax and chopped the wire in two about 4 feet from the ground, where it ran down on the side of the tree on the inside of the yard. He then noticed that one of the wires still continued to burn. He stood there watching it, and his father came out of the house a second time and ordered him to go in the house. The deceased then walked towards the swing and took hold of it, and was instantly killed. The boy says that from the time the current of electricity was first turned on until his father was killed there was an interval of only about fifteen minutes. The boy says he did not warn his father against taking hold of the steel rope of the swing, because he did not have time to do so, because of the excitement, and because he did not know there was any current of electricity in the steel rope. The evidence discloses, however, that copper wire is one of the best conductors of electricity that is known, and that while the wire was "grounded" the current of electricity would leave the electric wire of the defendant, pass through the copper wire into the earth at the point where it was "grounded," thence through the earth to the nearest point where there was another "ground," and thence back to the wire, and so on around the circuit. This is called "short circuiting." The evidence further discloses that a tree, a telephone, telegraph, district messenger, or other wire coming in contact with the arc wire will ground the circuit of electricity, and that a live tree, a human being, or any metallic substance is a conductor of electricity, varying somewhat in the character of the conductor; that electricity will always follow the best conductor, although some of it may be diverted from the arc wire even by a less efficient conductor. The evidence adduced by both parties further shows, and it is admitted by counsel, that where there is only one "ground" it is harmless, and that in order to produce injury there must be two "grounds," and that when there are two "grounds," if a person comes in contact with one of them, his body will form a part of the circuit through which the electricity will pass, and, if the electricity is of sufficient force and quantity, it will result in injury. Mr. Richardson, the general manager of the defendant, testified, on cross-examination, that, if there were two "grounds," and the wire had not been cut by the boy, as above described, but had been allowed to remain "grounded" or to lie on the ground, a current of electricity would have flowed over the copper wire, and if a man took hold of the copper wire the electricity would pass through his body.

This is a sufficient statement of the facts, and there is no substantial controversy about them. Upon this showing, the defendant claims: First, that, even conceding that there was another "ground," and that the defendant was negligent in not discovering and remedying it, nevertheless, that negligence of the defendant was not the proximate cause of the injury, but that the cutting of the copper wire by the boy was the proximate cause of the injury, and, that act having been done after the current of electricity was turned on, and when it was impossible to test the wire for "grounds," the defendant is not liable; second, that the defendant was only bound to exercise ordinary care and vigilance, that it owned no duty to the deceased, and that the injury was caused by the unexpected, unanticipated, and heretofore unheard-of extraordinary act of a trespasser, for which the defendant is not liable; third, that the court erred in giving erroneous instructions for the plaintiff; and fourth, that the court erred in admitting incompetent evidence offered by the plaintiff.

1. The first contention of the defendant is that, even conceding that there was another "ground," and that the defendant was negligent in not discovering or remedying it, nevertheless, that negligence of the defendant was not the proximate cause of the injury, but that the cutting of the copper wire by the boy was the proximate cause of the injury, and, that act having been done after the current of electricity was turned on, and when it was impossible to test the wire for "grounds," the defendant is not liable. The case has been remarkably well briefed and argued by counsel on both sides. A multiplicity of cases, both from this and other states, have been cited by counsel on both sides, and the question of proximate cause has been very thoroughly gone over. It would be impossible in a single opinion to review the cases and analyze fully the law as declared by many decisions and the text writers bearing upon this question. The proposition of law involved has been so often discussed and decided by this court that it is unnecessary to look elsewhere for authority. The law is well settled in this state that the doctrine of comparative negligence does not obtain in this state. The doctrine of concurrent negligence is firmly rooted in the jurisprudence of this state. The law is well settled in this state that "a defendant may be liable even if the accident was not caused by his sole negligence. He is liable if his negligence concurred with that of another, or with the act of God, or with an inanimate cause, and became a part of the direct and proximate cause, although not the sole cause." Newcomb v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 169 Mo., loc. cit. 422, 69 S. W. 348 et seq. and cases cited. In Brash v. St. Louis, 161 Mo., loc. cit. 437, 61 S. W. 808, the negligence of the city complained of combined with the act of God. Brace, J., speaking for the court, quoted the rule laid down in 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, 5th ed. § 39, as follows: "It is universally agreed that, if the damage is caused by the concurring force of the defendant's negligence and some other force for which he is not responsible, including 'the act of God,' or superhuman force intervening, the defendant is nevertheless responsible if his negligence is one of the proximate causes of the damage, within the definition already given. It is also agreed that, if the negligence of the defendant concurs with the other cause of the injury in point of time and place, or otherwise so directly contributes to the plaintiff's damage that it is reasonably certain that the other cause alone would not have sufficed to produce it, the defendant is liable, notwithstanding he may not have anticipated the interference of the superior force which, concurring with his own negligence, produced the damage. But, if the superior force would have produced the same damage whether the defendant had been negligent or not, his negligence is not deemed the cause of the injury." And it was there said: "And this is the prevailing doctrine in this state;" citing cases. In Vogelgesang v. St. Louis, 139 Mo. 127, 40 S. W. 653, the negligence of the city complained of consisted in permitting a small depression to remain in the street at the end of a bridge across a railroad track, which, under ordinary circumstances, would have been safe for public travel. Combined with this condition was the fact that an engine passing under the bridge suddenly emitted an unusual quantity of steam, thereby frightening the plaintiff's team and causing it to run away and injure the plaintiff. A recovery against the city was sustained on the ground that, although the act of the city in permitting the depression to remain in the street would not, ordinarily, have been productive of any injury, yet, when it combined with the other independent, intervening cause,—the emitting of steam from the engine,—it was one of the direct and proximate causes of the injury. In Bassett v. St. Joseph, 53 Mo. 200, 14 Am. Rep. 446, the negligence of the city consisted in leaving an excavation adjacent to a market place. The street, exclusive of the excavation, was sufficient for ordinary passage. The plaintiff was passing along that portion of the street when a mule kicked at her. To avoid being kicked she dodged and fell into the ditch. The city was held liable notwithstanding its negligence would not ordinarily have produced the injury, but because when combined with the independent, intervening cause,—the kick of the mule,—it was one of the proximate causes of the injury. In Brennan v. St. Louis, 92 Mo. 482, 2 S. W. 481, the negligence of the city consisted in not repairing a ditch which had been washed across the street and sidewalk by the rain. The plaintiff, a three-year-old child, with her sister, thirteen years old, who was pushing a baby carriage with a baby in it, was passing along the sidewalk close to the ditch, when another little girl came up, stumbled against the plaintiff, and both fell in the ditch, and the plaintiff was injured. The city was held liable because its negligence concurred with the independent, intervening cause, and was one of the proximate causes of the injury. Many other cases in this state might be cited illustrative of the rule in reference to concurrent negligence constituting proximate cause, but the foregoing cases are sufficient to demonstrate that, if a defendant is negligent and his negligence combines with that of another, or with any other independent, intervening cause, he is liable, although his negligence was not the sole negligence or the sole proximate cause, and although his negligence, without such other independent, intervening cause, would not have produced the injury.

Applying these rules to the facts in judgment, the defendant must be held liable. It is conceded that, if there was only one "ground" no damage would result to a person coming in contact with the substance constituting the "grounding" of the current. Or, in this case, that, if there had been no other "ground" except that created by the son of the deceased making the connection with the arc wire, no injury would have resulted. It is conceded that there must be two "grounds" in order to produce injury. Hence it follows that there must have been some other "ground" at some other place than that made by the son of the deceased, as aforesaid. The testimony discloses that at some time after 2 P. M.—the defendant claims the fact to be that it was at 4:55 P. M.—the defendant discovered that there was a "ground" on circuit No. 32, and sent out a man to locate it and remedy it. That man says he started at some time between 2 and half past 3 P. M. The record of the defendant, introduced in evidence, recites that: "All O. K. at 4:55 P. M., except 18-32 up town." The defendant claims that this was the time the boy made the connection with the wire aforesaid. Conceding this to be true, and conceding that the lineman started to discover the trouble at 4:55 P. M., the evidence discloses the fact to be that he made tests at only three points that he can designate, covering a space of 2 miles, and at a point other than in front of the Harrison residence. How far it was from the Harrison residence is not disclosed. The evidence shows, however, that circuit No. 32 was 20 miles long, and that the lineman only tested 2 miles thereof, and then sent in a report, "No. 32 O. K. at 5:15 P. M. The lineman says he did not discover where the trouble was, but was of opinion that it was not on circuit No. 32, but was somewhere on the trunk line. The evidence further discloses that when a test is made at the main office it will not disclose whether there is or is not more than one "ground," nor will it disclose the location of the "ground," and that those facts can only be ascertained, with the means employed by the defendant, by having tests made at different points along the line. The lineman says that in sending in that report at 5:15 P. M., he did not mean to say that, the line was "cleared;" that is, the trouble remedied, but simply meant to say that the electricity could be turned on without injury to him, as he had quit experimenting. The evidence further discloses that such tests cannot be made while the current of electricity is on the wire. After receiving the report at 5:15 P. M., the defendant, so far as this record discloses, made no further attempt to discover whether the line was "clear" before it turned on the current of electricity at 7:25 P. M.

The defendant contends that, if there was only one "ground," no damage would result to anyone, and this is conceded by the plaintiff. Upon this basis the defendant further claims that, even if it had not detected and remedied the "ground" made by the son of the deceased before it turned on the current of electricity, no damage would have ensued unless there had been some other "ground" also existing. Assuming this to be true, the question is whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in turning on the current of electricity at 7:25 P. M., without making any other tests to discover whether there was trouble on the line. It is conceded that it would only take four to five minutes to make such a test. Reduced to its last analysis, therefore, the fact is that at some time before the current of electricity was turned on, the defendant knew that there was trouble on the line,—that is, that there were one or more "grounds." It sent out one of its linemen to remedy it. That lineman did not do so. The trouble continued; the current of electricity was turned on, and the accident ensued. Whatever may have been understood by the servants and officers of the defendant as to the true meaning of the report sent in by the lineman at 5:15 P. M., the fact remains that the trouble had not been remedied, and the defendant had ample time in which to have done so, or else it should not have turned on the electricity until it knew that the trouble had been remedied. The negligence of the lineman was the negligence of the defendant, and, if he failed to report the fact that he had not discovered and remedied the trouble, his failure is imputable to the defendant. Under the circumstances, there is no escape from the conclusion that the defendant was negligent in turning on the current of electricity after it knew that there was trouble, without making a test at the main office to discover the true state of affairs, and without positively knowing that the trouble had been remedied. The fact that its negligence would not have resulted in the injury complained of except for the independent intervening negligence of the son of the deceased does not relieve the defendant from liability, for the act of the son of the deceased could not have produced the injury unless the defendant had turned on the current of electricity, nor unless there had also been a second ground somewhere else. The defendant's negligence was, therefore, a direct and proximate cause, or one of the direct and proximate causes, which concurred with the act of the son of the deceased to produce the injury, and, under the rule in this state, the defendant is liable.

2. The second contention of the defendant is that the defendant was only bound to exercise ordinary care and diligence; that it owed no duty to the deceased, and that the injury was caused by the unexpected, unanticipated, and heretofore unheard-of, extraordinary act of a trespasser, for which the defendant is not liable. The testimony discloses that never before had anyone so attempted to make a connection with an are wire in Kansas City, Missouri, but that this defendant had had an experience of that sort with respect to the part of its system located in Kansas City, Kansas. As to this defendant, therefore, it cannot be said that the act of the son of the deceased in making the connection was an unheard-of, unprecedented act. The defendant contends that it owed no duty to the deceased. This contention is untenable. It employed one of the most insidious and dangerous agencies known to man. Electricity is more powerful for good and for evil than any other agency known to mankind. It is the most dangerous form of peril, for it moves unseen, unheard, gives no warning, and may travel anywhere and everywhere. The defendant knew the character of the agency it employed, knew the means it employed for transmitting it for the good it would do, and knew the dangers to be apprehended from a "grounding" of its wires, and knew of the inevitable result to any person who might come in contact with that current where there were two "grounds." It knew that, unless its system was in good order, it was liable to injure some person at some time and place, or at any time or at any place, that such person came in contact with it. The point here made, that the defendant cannot be held liable because the particular injury complained of could not have been anticipated by any reasonable man, or that it would not have occurred, under common experience, was decided adversely to that contention by this court in Hoepper v. Southern Hotel Co. 142 Mo., loc. cit. 388, 44 S. W. 259. It was there said: "It is true, the negligent act must, in all cases, be the proximate cause of the injury in order to make the actor responsible therefor. But, if the injury follows as a direct consequence of the negligent act of omission, it cannot be said that the actor is not responsible therefor because the particular injury could not have been anticipated. A neglect to anticipate and guard against that which no reasonable man would expect to occur may not be negligence. 'If the wrong and the damage are not known by common experience to be usual in sequence, and the damage does not, according to the ordinary course of events, follow from the wrong, the wrong and damage are not sufficiently conjoined or concatenated as cause and effect to support the action.' [Citing cases.] But, in case the negligence is shown, and the injurious consequences are immediate, and flow directly from the negligent act, the person guilty of the act will not be excused for the reason that the particular consequences were unusual, and could not ordinarily have been foreseen.' Graney v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 140 Mo. 98, 38 L.R.A. 633, 41 S. W. 246; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 432, and cases cited. In Smith v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 6 C. P. 20, it is said by Channell, B.: 'I quite agree that, where there is no direct evidence of negligence, the question what a reasonable man might foresee is of importance in considering the question whether there is evidence of negligence for the jury or not; but, when it has been determined that there is evidence of negligence, the person guilty of it is equally liable for its consequences, whether he could have foreseen them or not.' . . . So the evidence tends to prove the negligence, and that the injury was the direct result thereof. It could make no difference whether or not defendant could have anticipated the particular injury." The same doctrine is laid down in Graney v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 140 Mo., loc. cit. 98, 38 L.R.A. 633, 41 S. W. 246; Miller v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 90 Mo. 389, 2 S. W. 439; Geismann v. Missouri-Edison Electric Co. 173 Mo. 654, 73 S. W. 654; Winkelman v. Kansas City Electric Light Co. 110 Mo. App. 184, 85 S. W. 99; Morrison v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 27 Mo. App. 418; Meade v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Mo. App., loc. cit. 101. And also obtains in other jurisdictions. Griffin v. United Electric Light Co. 164 Mass., loc. cit. 493, 32 L.R.A. 400, 49 Am. St. Rep. 477, 41 N. E. 675; McLaughlin v. Louisville Electric Light Co. 100 Ky. 173, 34 L.R.A. 812, 37 S. W. 851; Ennis v. Gray, 87 Hun, loc. cit. 357, 34 N. Y. Supp. 379; Higgins v. Dewey, 107 Mass. 494, 9 Am. Rep. 63. See also 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 487 et seq. The defendant relies upon Fuchs v. St. Louis, 167 Mo. 620, 57 L.R.A. 136, 67 S. W. 610; Chandler v. Kansas City Missouri Gas Co. 174 Mo. 321, 62 L.R.A. 474, 97 Am. St. Rep. 570, 73 S. W. 502; and Paden v. Van Blarcom, 181 Mo. 117, 79 S. W. 1195. Those cases, however, are easily distinguishable from the cases cited, and from the case at bar, in this, that in none of them was any act of negligence on the part of the defendant shown, or else the jury was required to find that the defendant had been negligent. Those cases are of such recent date that a close analysis thereof is not necessary to further demonstrate their inapplicability to the case at bar. In the Fuchs Case there was absolutely no evidence of negligence on the part of the city. In the Chandler Case the same was true, but the negligent act which caused the injury was solely attributable to a third person, and the defendant had no knowledge of it, and such an act had never before been experienced by it in the conduct of its business. A similar independent, intervening cause had been experienced by this defendant prior to this occasion. The Paden Case passed off entirely upon the theory that the court could not say, as a matter of law, whether or not the defendant was guilty of negligence under the circumstances, but that it was a question for the jury under the facts in judgment there. And the court in that case distinctly held that the decision in the Fuchs Case was not in conflict with anything said in that case.

3. The next contention of the defendant is that the court erred in giving erroneous instructions for the plaintiff. The only instruction given for the plaintiff, which is set out in the abstract of the record, is as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that on the evening of the 24th day of April, 1902, the defendant caused to be transmitted over an electric arc-light circuit owned and operated by it, a current of electricity of such character that it was liable to be dangerous to human life, if diverted in whole or in part from the wire of such circuit; and if you further believe that the wire of such circuit at the time such current was so transmitted, if it was so transmitted, was in such condition that such circuit was liable to be diverted in whole or in part from the wire of such circuit; and if you further believe that such current was so liable to be diverted, if so liable, because the wire of such circuit was electrically connected with the ground at that time at two or more places so as to divert a sufficient volume of electricity to kill a man; and if you further believe from the evidence that, at the time the foregoing conditions existed, if they did exist, the defendant knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence could or should have known, that such condition existed, or that there was a probability of their existence; and if you further believe that it was a want of reasonable care and prudence on the part of the defendant to so transmit such current of electricity under the circumstances aforesaid as claimed by the plaintiff to have existed, and you find that each and every one of such circumstances did exist; and if you further find that, by reason of such a diversion of the whole or a part of such a current under such circumstances, if so diverted under such circumstances, the whole or a part of such diverted current passed through and into the body of Francis M. Harrison and killed him, without contributory negligence on his part, and that the diversion of such a current so transmitted was the proximate cause of the death of Francis M. Harrison, and that such death was due to the want of such ordinary care and prudence on the part of the defendant or its employees, under all the circumstances found by you to exist; and you further believe that the plaintiff on said day was the wife of said Harrison and suffered pecuniary loss from his death,—your verdict should be for the plaintiff." It is objected that this instruction is erroneous because it made the defendant responsible if the jury found that somebody was liable to divert the current, or if there was a probability that it would be diverted, or if "the current was transmitted under the circumstances claimed by the plaintiff, and thus referred the jury to the indefinite proposition as to what the plaintiff might claim;" that it submitted to the jury the question of what was the proximate cause of the death, and that it assumed as a fact that two "grounds" existed. This criticism is not well taken. It was conceded by both parties that the current of electricity was not only liable to be dangerous to human life, but was certainly dangerous to human life if two "grounds" existed; and both sides admit that, unless two "grounds" had existed, no injury would have resulted in this case, and as an injury did result, under the concession on both sides, it follows that two "grounds" must have existed. The instruction, in speaking of the liability of the current being diverted, or of the probability of its being diverted, had reference entirely to the condition of the wire with respect to the abrasure of the insulation, which was shown to have existed for at least a month before the date of the accident, and simply required the jury to find whether or not the defendant had exercised reasonable care and prudence in ascertaining and remedying such condition if it existed, and was, therefore, unobjectionable in that respect.

The objection that it left the jury to hold the defendant liable if they found that the current was transmitted under the circumstances claimed by the plaintiff, and thus referred to the jury the indefinite proposition as to what the plaintiff might claim, arises entirely from overlooking the fact that the instruction used the word "aforesaid," and required the jury to find that the current was transmitted "under the circumstances aforesaid as claimed by the plaintiff to have existed (and you find that each and every one of such circumstances did exist). Thus the instruction referred to the prior predicates therein, and did not give the jury such a roving commission as counsel refer to. The last objection to the instruction is that it left the jury to determine the proximate cause of the death. The instruction specifies all the facts which the jury were required to find in order to make the defendant liable, and then told them that, if they found "that the diversion of such current so transmitted was the proximate cause of the death of Francis M. Harrison, and that such death was due to the want of ordinary care and prudence on the part of the defendant or its employees, under all the circumstances found by you to exist," etc. Used in this connection, after having first defined to the jury all the facts that it was necessary for them to find, in order to make the defendant liable, the use of the term "proximate cause" certainly could not have misled the jury under the facts in judgment here. The facts are practically undisputed. Under those facts the defendant is liable. The verdict of the jury, therefore, simply announces a conclusion, as to the facts concerning which there is no dispute, and under which the law imposes a liability on the defendant. The instruction, therefore, could not have misled the jury to the defendant's prejudice, and could have had no effect upon the merits of the case, and therefore the use of the words "proximate cause" in that instruction does not constitute reversible error. But, on the contrary, the use of the term "proximate cause" in an instruction has been expressly sanctioned by this court. Anderson v. Union Terminal R. Co. 161 Mo., loc. cit. 428, 61 S. W. 874.

4. The last contention of the defendant is that the court erred in admitting incompetent evidence offered by the plaintiff. The testimony here claimed to have been incompetent is the testimony of the witness Newkirk, a consulting electrical and mechanical engineer, to the effect that there are well-known methods of preventing accidents like that here involved, which provide the line of wires with "loops," so that when trouble or a "grounding" is found to exist on any part of the system, that portion of the system where the trouble exists may be disconnected from the balance of the system and thereby enable the lighting company to turn on the current of electricity and furnish lights to all parts of the system except that where the difficulty or trouble exists. This witness further testified that the "magneto" employed by the defendant was not the most effective or delicate instrument for detecting trouble or "grounds" on its lines, and that it would not enable the servants of the defendant to ascertain the location of the trouble when applying the test at the main office, and that there was an instrument called a "galvanometer," which is a much more delicate instrument than the "magneto," and by which not only the question of whether there is a "ground," but also how many "grounds" exist, and the location of each, can be ascertained at the main office. At first the court, over the objection of the defendant, permitted the testimony as to the galvanometer to go in, but afterwards, on the defendant's objection, the court excluded that testimony and instructed the jury not to consider it in making up their verdict. As to the action of the trial court in first admitting and afterwards excluding the testimony as to the galvanometer, it was clearly not error. To hold otherwise would be to establish the rule of practice that when a court made a mistake and admitted incompetent testimony, and afterwards discovered that it had done so, it could not effectually correct the error by instructions to the jury, but that, in order to remove the sting of the error, it would have to discharge the jury and award a new trial before a new venire. Such a rule could not reasonably be expected to be announced by any court. When a trial court becomes satisfied that it has erred in the admission of testimony, all that it can do is to instruct the jury to disregard it, and the presumption is that the jury did disregard it. It is not easy to perceive what injury the testimony of the witness as to the loops aforesaid did the defendant in this case. The testimony shows that the test disclosed the fact that there was trouble on circuit No. 32; that defendant sent out a lineman to locate it and correct it; that the lineman, instead of doing so, made a wholly insufficient test, and then, without fully investigating, concluded that the trouble was on the trunk line, and not on circuit No. 32. If the defendant, therefore, had had a system of such loops, the lineman would not have disconnected circuit No. 32 from the trunk line for the reason that he had concluded that the trouble did not exist on circuit No. 32. If the trouble existed on the trunk line, as the lineman concluded was the fact, it would not have been necessary to disconnect circuit No. 32, but would have been necessary to turn off the current of electricity on the trunk line. As hereinbefore pointed out, the negligence of the defendant in this case consists in its failure to ascertain, by means within its reach and at hand, whether the line was "clear" before it turned the current of electricity at 7:25 P. M., onto the trunk line, from which it was distributed to the various lamp loop lines, including No. 32.

Under the circumstances in this case, therefore, the question of whether it had or had not such loops as were described by the expert witness could have no possible bearing upon the defendant's liability, or upon the merits of this case. The law does not require the defendant, or anyone else, to adopt any particular appliances. All that the law requires is that the appliances adopted by the defendant shall be reasonably safe. If they are not, the defendant is liable. Not because it did not adopt better appliances, but because those it did adopt and use were not reasonably safe for the purposes for which they were used. The evidence of this witness as to the loops should not, therefore, have been admitted, but it is impossible that it could have had any effect whatever upon the verdict of the jury in this case, nor could it in any manner have affected the negligence of the defendant in turning on the current of electricity at 7:25 P. M. without using the tests it had to find out whether the line was "clear" or not. That was the negligence of the defendant which produced, and would produce, the injury complained of, and which the defendant might have averted by employing the means it had. It is true that the negligence of the defendant, standing alone, would not have caused the injury without the act of the boy in making the connection with the defendant's wire. It is also true that the act of the boy in making that connection could not have caused the injury complained of without the negligence of the defendant in turning on the current of electricity without first ascertaining that the line was "clear." Thus, it required the concurrent negligence of the defendant and of the boy to produce the injury, and, as above shown, the defendant is liable, although its concurrent act was not the sole cause of the injury. And it makes no difference in this case that the boy was the son of the deceased. The legal consequence is the same as if it had been done by an entire stranger to the deceased.

For these reasons the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

All concur.

ARIZONA SUPREME COURT.

NEW YORK FOUNDLING HOSPITAL

JOHN C. GATTI.

(— Ariz. —, 79 Pac. 231.)

Habeas corpus—foreign corporation.

1. That a foreign corporation which has attempted to place children under its care

Case Note.—Recognition of right emanating from foreign power to the custody and control of a child:—The fundamental proposition on this subject is thus stated by the United States Supreme Court in Lamar v. Micou, 112 U. S. 470, 28 L. ed. 757, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 221, in its relation to the recognition of the authority of a foreign guardian,—and the principle is doubtless the same as applied to any other form of authority emanating from a foreign state or country:—"By the law of England and of this country, a guardian appointed by the courts of one state has no authority over the ward's person or property in another state, except so far as allowed by the comity of that state, as expressed through its legislature or its courts."

But, while this fundamental principle is not to be lost sight of, it does not solve the difficulties of the subject. The practical question is whether, and under what circumstances, the courts of one state or country will, upon principles of comity, recognize such authority emanating from a foreign jurisdiction.

in homes within the state has exceeded its charter authority, and that it has not complied with the provisions of the local law so as to be entitled to do business within the state, will not prevent its applying for a writ of habeas corpus to recover the custody of the children in case they are wrongfully seized by strangers.

Same—foundlings—interest of child.

2. The court will not grant the application of a foundling hospital which, through a mistake of its agents and representatives, has placed children which have come to its care in homes of filth and degradation in a distant state, to recover their custody from persons of some means and education, who, actuated by humanitarian motives, have rescued them from their unfortunate surroundings, administered to their needs, and became attached to them, so that they are willing to care for and educate them as their own, so that it appears that the change will not work for the best interests of the children.

(January 21, 1905.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure possession of a child which was alleged to have been wrongfully seized and detained by respondent. Dismissed.

Statement by Kent, Ch. J.:

The New York Foundling Hospital, a corporation, filed its petition in this court, praying for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to one John C. Gatti, commanding said Gatti to produce the body of William Norton, an infant, and to make return by what right he holds said infant in his possession and under his custody and control. In its application for the writ, petitioner

There was formerly a tendency to deny the foreign guardian any rights in respect to the person of the child, for the same reason that the authority of a foreign executor or administrator is denied. Thus, Judge Story (Conflict of Laws, § 499) said: "The rights and powers of guardians are considered as strictly local, and not as entitling them to exercise any authority over the person or personal property of their wards in other states, upon the same general reasoning and policy which have circumscribed the rights and authorities of executors and administrators." This statement has been frequently approved by the courts. See Hoyt v. Sprague, 103 U. S. 613, 36 L. ed. 585; Re Nickals, 21 Nev. 462, 34 Pac. 250; Rogers v. McLean, 31 Barb. 304; Carr v. Wellborn, Dallam (Tex.) 624.

So, in the celebrated case of Johnstone v. Beattie, 10 Clark & F. 42, the House of Lords, by a majority vote against a strong dissent by Lords Brougham and Campbell, refused to recognize the authority of a Scotch guardian over a ward who was personally in England.

alleged that it is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of New York; that, under and by virtue of its charter, it is duly authorized and empowered to receive, and keep under its care, charge, custody, and management, children of the age of two years and under, found in the city of New York, abandoned or deserted, and left in the crib or other receptacle of petitioner for foundlings; that, by virtue of its charter, it found and received, and took under its care, charge, custody, and management, the child named in the petition; that, on or about the 1st day of October, 1904, in the exercise of its care, charge, custody, and management of said child, it placed said child in the home of a certain person in the town of Clifton, Graham county, Arizona, to be held and cared for by said person in said home temporarily, and at all times subject to the supervision of the petitioner and its officers and agents; that, on or about the 2d day of October, 1904, the respondent unlawfully, and by means of force and violence, took possession of said child from the person to whom it was intrusted by the petitioner, and has ever since retained possession of the same, and the said child is now in the custody and under the control of the said respondent, without the consent or license of the petitioner, and against its desire, intention, and protest.

In response to the writ issued under said petition, the respondent, as directed, pro-

The statement above quoted from Story is sustained by the modern cases so far as it involves the proposition that the foreign appointment has no efficacy ex proprio vigore, but is not sustained by them so far as it implies that the authority of the foreign guardian will not be recognized as a matter of comity. Upon the contrary, the tendency is to recognize such authority upon principles of comity. Thus, the court, in Lamar v. Micou, supra, after laying down the fundamental proposition already quoted, added: "But the tendency of modern statutes and decisions is to defer to the law of the domicile, and to support the authority of the guardian appointed there." Practically, as stated in 1 Parmele's Wharton, Confli. L. § 263a, the courts before which the question as to the care and custody of a child arises apply substantially the same principle whether the right of a foreign or domestic guardian is involved. Prima facie the guardian, whether domestic or foreign, is entitled to the custody of the ward; but in neither case is the right an absolute one. In either case the right of the guardian yields to the best interests of the child if they require that the latter shall be intrusted to the custody of another person. As suggested in the work just referred to, the fact that the guardian receives his appointment from a foreign state or country, and, if awarded the custody of the ward, will probably remove the latter from the jurisdiction, may, perhaps, make the court more cautious in awarding him the custody of the ward than if he were the domestic guardian, and would, with the child, remain subject to the control of the court. But, with this exception, a foreign guardian appointed at the domicile of the ward seems, for practical purposes, to stand as well before the court, so far as the custody of the ward's person is concerned, as though he had received his appointment and authority from a local tribunal. The foregoing statement of the principles governing the subject is exemplified by the following cases:

Thus, the guardian of the person of the minor, appointed on the application of the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

father in another state at his technical domicile, has not an absolute right to the custody of the child as against the guardian appointed at the child's actual residence; but the custody will be awarded with reference to the welfare of the child. Kelsey v. Green, 69 Conn. 291, 38 L.R.A. 471, 37 Atl. 679.

As a matter of comity, a guardian appointed in another state may maintain habeas corpus in New Hampshire to obtain the custody of a minor ward who is residing in the latter state with a relative. Hanrahan v. Sears, 72 N. H. 71, 54 Atl. 702. The court, said, in effect, that the decision of the point turns upon the question whether the child's welfare will be best promoted by taking her from her relatives, with whom she had lived for many years, and for whom she may have feelings of filial regard, and placing her in the custody of the relator, an officer appointed under the laws of Vermont; that, while the official character of the relator may have a legitimate bearing upon the question of custody, other considerations may be of controlling significance.

In Grimes v. Butsch, 142 Ind. 113, 41 N. E. 328, a guardian of the person of a ward, appointed in Missouri where the ward was domiciled, was held entitled to the custody of the child as against the latter's sister. The opinion shows that the foreign guardian's right was not regarded as an absolute one, and that the decision was put upon the ground that it was for the best interests of the child that his custody be awarded to the foreign guardian rather than to the sister.

A guardian appointed at the domicile of the minor has no absolute right to the custody of the latter in another state, but can never be held guilty of false imprisonment simply from the fact that he takes charge of the ward's person and removes him to the domicile. Townsend v. Kendall, 4 Minn. 412, 77 Am. Dec. 534, Gil. 315.

A grant to the father, of letters of guardianship over the person and property of a minor, by a court of competent jurisdiction where they are domiciled, strengthens the duced the said child in court, and made return to the writ as follows: A motion to quash the writ was made upon the ground that the petition failed to disclose that the petitioner has any legal right to maintain the action, for the reason that the charter under which it was organized gives it no right of guardianship over the children committed to its care and custody; that its authority is limited to the reception in its institution of infants of the age of two years or under, found in the city of New York, who have been abandoned or deserted, and such as are surrendered to it under the provisions of its charter, and to keep within said institution said infants during their minority; and that said charter does not confer upon said institution the right to make any such disposition of said children as was made by the petitioner, as set forth in its petition; and that, by making such disposition, the said petitioner has lost such power, right, and authority as may have been conferred upon it by the charter of the state of New York to retain the custody and control of said infant. The respondent, by way of plea in abatement, set up that the petitioner had no right to maintain the action, for the reason that it appears upon the face of the petition that the petitioner is a foreign corporation, and has not filed a copy of its articles of incorporation or charter, or the appointment of an agent resident within the territory, upon whom process may be served, as provided in chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes and the amend-claim of the latter when contested beyond that jurisdiction. Taylor v. Jeter, 33 Ga. 195, 81 Am. Dec. 202. It was further said in this case that, where the father has been approved as a fit and proper custodian by a court of his domicile the court of another state, to which the child has been taken by a stranger, will not overthrow the father's authority, except upon a distinct issue, and upon most direct and overwhelming evidence of his unfitness.

In Wells v. Andrews, 60 Miss. 373, it appeared that it was the last wish of both the father and the mother of minor children domiciled in Tennessee that a certain person should take charge of them and manage their estates, and, after the death of both parents, such person received an appointment as guardian by a Tennessee court. The day he made the application the children were removed to Mississippi by their grandparents. It was held by the Mississippi supreme court that, under the circumstances, the children should be committed to the custody of the Tennessee guardian. Here, too, it is plain that the court did not regard the Tennessee guardian's right as absolute, and that the welfare of the minors was the chief consideration.

In Nugent v. Vetzera, L. R. 2 Eq. 704, the vice chancellor refused to interfere, upon the ground of any supposed benefit to the children, with the discretion of a guardian appointed by a foreign court of competent jurisdiction, who desired to remove his wards from England, where they had been sent for the purpose of education, in order to complete their education in their own country. The vice chancellor, however, refused to discharge an order by which the guardians had been appointed over the children in England, and merely reserved to the foreign guardian the exclusive custody of the children, to which he was entitled by the order of the court of his own country.

Though the power of a guardian, like that of an administrator, is local to the state in which he receives his appointment, yet he is competent to receive the property or the custody of the ward, when placed in his hands by the courts of another state, to be taken to the state where either or both belong and in which he receives his appointment. The court must exercise its discretion in making an order to deliver over the custody of the ward to a foreign guardian, and the latter must make proof of his guardianship. Warren v. Hofer, 13 Ind. 167.

In Com. ex rel. Sage v. Sage, 160 Pa. 399, 28 Atl. 863, a habeas corpus proceeding by a father in Pennsylvania to obtain the custody of a child from the mother, it was held that the facts that the father was domiciled in New Jersey, and that, by the law of that state, he was the child's natural guardian, did not justify the awarding of the custody of the child to him without inquiring as to his fitness to have such custody.

In Wilkins's Guardian, 146 Pa. 585, 23 Atl. 325, the guardian of the persons of minor children, appointed in the state where they were then domiciled, without obtaining the consent of the domiciliary court, brought them to Pennsylvania, where most of their property was located; and one of their relatives was there appointed guardian of their persons. The appointment, under the circumstances being a judicious one, was upheld against the objection of the foreign guardian, the court taking the view that the domicile of the children had been changed by their removal to and residence in Pennsylvania with the consent of their foreign guardian.

A guardian appointed for an infant by a court in one state will not, on the ground of comity, be given custody of the child against its best interests by the courts of another state into which the child was taken, although the child was removed from the state where the guardian was appointed contemporaneously with, and possibly for the purpose of escaping the effect of, proceedings for the guardian's appointment. Jones v. Bowman, 13 Wyo. 79, 67 L.R.A. 860, 77 Pac. 439.

In the following cases, where the court in which the child was found refused to yield the custody to the foreign guardian, the decisions were controlled by the court's ments thereto. By way of further return, respondent alleged that letters of guardianship of the person of the child named in the petition were granted to the respondent by the probate court of Graham county, Arizona, and that said respondent, under and by virtue of said letters of guardianship, has duly qualified as such guardian by taking the oath and giving the bond required by law and the order of said court, and that thereupon respondent became, was, and now is, the legally appointed and acting guardian of said child; that, upon the hearing of the application for said letters of guardianship, the petitioner appeared, and from the order of said court appointing respondent guardian as aforesaid it has taken an appeal to the district court of the second judicial district of the territory of Arizona. The respondent further made return that the child charged in the petition to be unlawfully in the custody and control of respondent is a white, Caucasian child, of the Anglo-Saxon race; that the petitioner, on or about the 1st day of October, 1904, brought the said child to the territory of Arizona, and abandoned him to the keeping of a Mexican Indian, whose name is unknown to the respondent, and who was and is financially unable properly to feed, clothe, shelter, maintain, and educate said child, and is otherwise, by reason of his race, mode of living, habits, and education, entirely unfit to have such care, control, and education of said child; that the said person to whom petitioner abandoned said child vol-view of the best interests of the child; and it was assumed that the fact that the foreign guardian received his appointment and authority from another jurisdiction would not have prevented the court from awarding the custody of the ward to him if, under the circumstances of the case, it had been for the latter's best interests to do so. Re Rice, 42 Mich. 528, 4 N. W. 284; Re Stockman, 71 Mich. 180, 38 N. W. 876; Foster v. Alston, 6 How. (Miss.) 406.

In the cases thus far cited it was assumed that the court by which the foreign guardian was appointed had jurisdiction to make the appointment by reason of the child's domicile within the jurisdiction. Of course, if the court which made the appointment had no jurisdiction, the foreign guardian's authority will not be recognized, even as a matter of comity. Grimmett v. Witherington, 16 Ark. 377, 63 Am. Dec. 66; Shorster v. Williams, 74 Ga. 539; Vennard's Succession, 44 La. Ann. 1076, 11 So. 705.

The recognition by a court of one state or country of a provision in a decree of divorce rendered in another, awarding the custody of a child to one of the parents, is governed by a principle closely analogous to that already discussed in connection with the recognition of the authority of a foreign guardian over the person of a child.

Thus, in People ex rel. Allen v. Allen, 105 N. Y. 628, 11 N. E. 143, the court dismissed an appeal from an order in habeas corpus proceedings awarding the custody of infant children to their mother, to whose care and custody they had been intrusted by a decree of divorce rendered in another state, upon the ground that the New York court awarding the custody to the mother gave to the foreign decree, not the force of an estoppel, or the conclusive effect sometimes due to a judgment, but simply regarded it as a fact or circumstance bearing upon the discretion to be exercised, without dictating or controlling it.

In Hammond v. Hammond, 90 Ga. 527, 16 S. E. 265, it was held that a decree of divorce rendered in Alabama, by a court having jurisdiction, confiding the custody of a child to the mother, had the effect to constitute her the lawful custodian in place of the father; and that the father, in order to obtain the custody of the child, must show that the mother is not a fit and proper person to rear it.

In Wilson v. Elliott, 96 Tex. 472, 97 Am. St. Rep. 928, 73 S. W. 946, it was held that a decree of divorce awarding the custody of the child of the marriage to the father, rendered by a court of another state or a territory having jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties, including the child, was res judicata and conclusive upon a Texas court, that the father was the proper person to have the custody of the child at the time the decree was rendered; but that such decree was not a bar to a subsequent proceeding in a court of Texas to modify it, upon proof that the situation and character of the respective parties had so changed as to render it to the interest of the child that it be committed to the care of the mother. The court further held that, while testimony of the conduct of the parties prior to the foreign decree was not admissible as substantive evidence upon the question as to which parent was entitled to the custody of the children, yet it might be admissible for the purpose of corroborating evidence of misconduct since that decree was rendered.

That a court of one state awards the custody of a child to one of the parents is not an estoppel of all future inquiry in the courts of another state, wherein the child has acquired a domicile. People ex rel. Hickey v. Hickey, 86 Ill. App. 20.

In Vetterlein's Petition, 14 R. I. 378, the court queried whether a decree of divorce rendered in another state, even if it were effective to dissolve the marriage, could have any force outside of the jurisdiction in which it was rendered so far as it affected the custody of the child. In this case, however, it was held that the court which rendered the decree did not have jurisdiction even to dissolve the marriage.

As is apparent from the case last cited, the question as to the recognition by a court of one state or country of a provision of a decree of divorce rendered in another, awarduntarily surrendered said child to certain persons, who thereupon placed said child in the care, custody, and control of respondent; that respondent is a fit person to have the care, custody, and control of said child, and that it will be to the best interest of said child that he be permitted to remain within the care, custody, and control of respondent, whose purpose and intention it is to rear, maintain, educate, and provide for said child, in all things, as though he were his own.

The motion to quash the writ was denied, and the plea in abatement was overruled. The petitioner's motion to strike was denied, and its demurrer to the return overruled.

Application for writs in sixteen other cases, involving the custody of sixteen other children, were brought by the petitioner. The petitions in those cases were similar to that filed in the case against John C. Gatti. The return in each of those cases was likewise similar to the return made in the Gatti Case. In response to the writs, the children were all produced in court. By stipulation entered into between the counsel for the petitioner and the counsel for the several respondents, it was agreed that the proof adduced in the trial of the application for the writ of habeas corpus in the case of John C. Gatti, the pleadings, and the testimony taken, should be taken, applied to, and considered by the court as filed, taken, and applied in each of the other cases for writs of habeas corpus brought by the petitioner, and that each of said cases should abide the result of the determination of the case of John C. Gatti. The case was thereupon tried upon the issues of fact raised by the petition, the return, and an amended traverse to the return filed by the petitioner.

The testimony was heard in open court, before the full bench, and, in accordance with the stipulation, was permitted to embrace all the facts deemed relevant and material to all the cases before the court. The testimony and evidence show the following facts:

The New York Foundling Hospital is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of New York, for the purpose of caring for abandoned and deserted infants found in the city of New York, and such as may be voluntarily surrendered to ing the custody of a child to one of the parties, is very frequently complicated by the question as to the jurisdiction of the court which rendered the decree. As a general rule, at least, anything which shows that the court which rendered the decree was without jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage will negative jurisdiction to award the custody of a child of the marriage, and will therefore deprive the provision awarding the custody of the child of any effect in another state or country. It is thus apparent that the recognition by a court of one state or country of a provision awarding the custody of a child in a decree of divorce rendered in another will frequently involve the vexed question as to the jurisdiction to render a divorce upon constructive service against a nonresident. That general question is treated in a note in 59 L.R.A. 165, and it is, of course, impossible to consider it here. It may be noted in this connection, however, that, even conceding the jurisdiction of a court under such circumstances to render a decree of divorce dissolving the marriage, it does not necessarily follow that the court will have jurisdiction to award the custody of a child of the marriage if the child, at the time of the decree, was outside of the state in which the same was rendered.

In Wakefield v. Ives, 35 Iowa, 238, a decree of divorce rendered in another state, though upon constructive service against a nonresident, was held conclusive upon the parties, unless reversed, modified, or set aside for cause shown to the jurisdiction, in a habeas corpus proceeding in Iowa for the custody of the child, which was awarded to the mother by the decree; 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) it appearing that the child was born in the state where the decree was rendered, and was living there at the time the decree was rendered. In Kline v. Kline, 57 Iowa, 386, 42 Am. Rep. 47, 10 N. W. 825, however, it was held that, while a decree of divorce rendered in another state upon constructive service against the defendant was valid and entitled to recognition in Iowa, so far as the status of the husband and wife were concerned, yet it was without jurisdiction and not entitled to recognition so far as it attempted to fix the custody of the minor children who at the time of the divorce were living with the wife in Iowa. Rodgers v. Rodgers, 56 Kan. 483, 43 Pac. 779, is to the same effect as the last case. So the court, in De la Montanya v. De la Montanya, 112 Cal. 101, 32 L.R.A. 82, 53 Am. St. Rep. 165, 44 Pac. 345, held that, even upon the assumption that jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage relation might be obtained upon constructive service against the husband, was domiciled within the state but was absent therefrom, jurisdiction could not be thus acquired for the purpose of awarding to the mother the custody of the children who were with the father.

The conclusion reached in the last three cases, that the decree of divorce rendered in the other state was not entitled to recognition so far as it affected the custody of the child, would, of course, have been true a fortiori if it had been assumed, as many courts do assume, that the foreign court did not have jurisdiction even to dissolve the marriage. Other cases in point on the subject of this note are sufficiently discussed in the opinion in the reported case.

it, of the age of two years or under; the act amending its charter providing that it should be under the care, management, and control of the religious order known as the "Sisters of Charity." While the act amending the charter of the hospital does not, in terms, authorize the institution so to do, it is shown that it has been, from the organization of the hospital, the practice of its managers to place infants of suitable age in homes within and without the state of New York, to be cared for, reared, supported, and educated in such homes by the persons to whom they are given, and that it so places some 450 children each year, and that the hospital authorities retain the right to visit such homes and to maintain a supervision over said children until they become of age. The evidence does not disclose the nature or extent of this supervision, nor the method by which it is exercised.

During the summer of 1904 the hospital authorities received a letter from a priest temporarily in charge of the parish of Clifton and Morenci, requesting that a certain number of children be sent from the institution to Clifton and Morenci, to be placed within the homes of certain of his parishioners, who were represented by said priest to be of the Spanish race, but to be persons who spoke the English language; that it was the desire of these people that only children of fair complexion be sent. In response to the application, and upon the representations made by the priest, 40 children were sent by the petitioner, under the charge of Sister Anna Michella and two other Sisters of Charity, and an agent by the name of Swayne, consigned to the persons whose names had been previously supplied by the priest. These children were of the Caucasian race, and, as requested by the said priest, chosen from among those in the institution who were fairest and lightest in complexion. They were all children of unusual beauty and attractiveness. Their ages were from eighteen months to five years. To the clothing of each child was attached a tag, giving the band number of each child, the name of the person to whom consigned, and the name and date of birth of the child. To each person to whom a child was assigned was sent a letter, signed by the sister superior, requesting that the consignee, within a week after the reception of the child, fill out a blank which was inclosed, containing the name of the child, the name of the foster parents in full, the business occupation and the postoffice address of such foster parents, and forward the same to the hospital authorities. The letter also requested that the person to whom each child was assigned should write yearly, about the 1st of May, how the child was progressing, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) and giving other items of interest. On the evening of October 1, 1904, the children, in charge of said sisters and agent, arrived in Clifton in a special car. It having become a matter of notoriety in Clifton that a number of children were to arrive, to be distributed to Mexican families, a crowd of Mexicans gathered at the station on the arrival of the train, together with a few American women of good families; the latter being attracted by curiosity and a desire to see the children, who, they supposed, were Mexicans. The children consigned to the persons in Clifton were taken from the car by those in charge of them, the Americans present assisting in taking them out. The latter were told by the agent that no disposition of the children to the Mexican families would be made that night, and, on being asked by one of the American women, he said that in the morning an opportunity would be given her to make an application for one of the children. Upon the arrival of the train, the priest came into the car, and Sister Anna Michella then asked him what sort of people they were, to whom the children were to be allotted. He thereupon said that they were all good American citizens, moral, and had no children of their own, and that the homes were all that could be wished for. Having noticed that some of the people were not as fair in color as she had hoped for and expected, the sister asked him if there would be any half-breeds among them, and he said, "No." She asked him how the people lived, and he replied that they lived in frame houses. She then stated to him that it was the rule of the home that the children were only placed out on trial until such time as the homes could be visited by the sisters, and that, if it were found that any of the homes were not as expected, the children would be removed. The children to be left at Clifton were taken to the priest's house, and 15 of them, under the supervision of the priest, were turned over that night to the persons to whom they were consigned. No visit to or examination of the homes of these people was made at any time, either by the agent, Swayne, the sisters in charge, or anyone, on behalf of the petitioner. They relied entirely upon the statement of the priest.

The evidence establishes, without contradiction, that the persons to whom the children were given, as assigned, both in Clifton and Morenci, were wholly unfit to be intrusted with them; that they were, with possibly one or two exceptions, of the lowest class of half-breed Mexican Indians; that they were impecunious, illiterate, unacquainted with the English language, vicious, and, in several instances, prostitutes and persons of notoriously bad character; that their homes were of the crudest sort, being for the most part built of adobe, with dirt floors and roofs; that many of them had children of their own, whom they were unable properly to support. Sister Anna Michella, who was intrusted with the matter of carrying out the instructions of the hospital authorities, was so struck by the unfitness of these people that in three instances she refused to allow the children to be delivered, and in other instances, as testified to by a witness, gave them up "with tears streaming from her eyes;" and from her own testimony it appears that she was not satisfied with the people to whom they were to be delivered, but that she felt she could not override the authority of the priest.

On the morning of the 2d of October, it became generally known to the American residents of Clifton that the children had been distributed the night before to these people. Much indignation was immediately aroused, and an informal conference of citizens was held to discuss the matter of the distribution of the children which had been made. A committee was appointed to go to Morenci and ascertain from the priest and the agent, Swayne, their purposes, and to inform them as to the feeling excited among the Americans over the distribution of these white children to these half-breed Indian families. This committee was composed of one Jeff Dunagan, a deputy sheriff, and one Thomas Simpson. The committee left Clifton about 1 o'clock in the afternoon, and arrived in Morenci shortly after 2 o'clock in the afternoon. They immediately went to see Mr. Mills, the superintendent of the copper company operating at that place,—one of the leading citizens of the town,—and, in company with him, went in search of the agent, Swayne, whom they found at the hotel. Dunagan then stated to the agent the feeling which had been aroused in Clifton, their purpose in visiting Morenci, and asked him what he would do in the matter. Both Dunagan and Simpson testified that in response to their inquiries the agent, Swayne, said that he knew his business, and did not propose to be dictated to by the people; that the children "had been placed, and would stay placed." The testimony of Swayne qualifies the statements of Dunagan and Simpson as to what was said by him on that occasion. But, whatever may have been the precise reply made by Swayne, it is not disputed that Dunagan and Simpson telephoned the information to the people in Clifton that they had seen Swayne, and that his reply was that he would not do anything; that the children had been placed, and would stay placed. Upon the receipt in Clifton of this information so telephoned, a meeting of the citizens was held, and a committee of 25 persons was named to collect the children from the people to whom they had been consigned, and to bring them to the principal hotel of the place. The members of the committee then visited the various homes of the persons having possession of the children, and stated to the latter that they had been sent by the American residents to take the children from their possession. In each instance the children, without protest, were voluntarily surrendered, and were thereupon taken to the hotel.

Upon the arrival of the train in Clifton, all the children were neatly clad, cleanly in appearance, and gave every evidence of careful nursing and proper attention. When the children were obtained from these people, they were in a filthy condition, covered with vermin, and, with two or three exceptions, ill and nauseated from the effects of coarse Mexican beans, chilis, watermelons, and other improper food which had been fed them, and in some instances from the effect of beer and whisky that had been given them to drink. Upon the arrival of the children at the hotel, certain good women of the place took charge of them, nursed them, and secured medical care and attention for them. On the next day the children were given to the several respondents in these cases, who have since had them in their care, custody, and control.

The agent, Swayne, and the priest, on the night of October 2d returned with Dunagan and Simpson to Clifton, arriving there in the early morning. Citizens to the number of 200 or 300 had assembled, and were waiting for their return. At this meeting much excitement was manifested, but no act of violence was done at that or any other time. Some threats, however, of a general character, were made by certain persons against the agent, Swayne. Both Swayne and the priest made a statement of their position at this meeting. Swayne at that time was apprehensive that he might receive bodily harm. In his statement at the meeting he said that the children were placed temporarily in charge of the people to whom they had been consigned, but the understanding was that the sisters were to remain for a matter of two or three weeks, and, if it were found by them that any of the children were placed in improper homes, they would be taken from such homes and replaced. He protested against the taking of the children by the American residents, and neither by his consent, nor that of the sisters, were the children either taken from the homes in which they had been placed or given to the respondents. On the next day other meetings were held, at which both the priest and Swayne were present. The Morenci children were not given up to the sisters or the agent by the people who had taken them in charge, for the reason that they feared, if so returned, the children might be again placed in equally unfit homes of Mexican Indians elsewhere. In Morenci, after the distribution of the children, and after the facts had become known, the same indignation was aroused among the American citizens, and much the same course was pursued as in Clifton. Mr. Mills, in company with others, called upon the sisters and upon Agent Swayne, and remonstrated with them against permitting the children to remain with the people to whom they had been distributed. As a result of these remonstrances, and a statement by Mr. Mills that the American residents of Morenci would not suffer the children so to remain, the priest and the agent, Swayne, visited the homes of the Mexicans having the children, and obtained a surrender of them, and brought them to the hotel; and these children, with the exception of three, who were turned over, at the request of Dunagan, to be distributed among American residents, were subsequently taken back by the sisters and the agent to the East, and there placed in homes. It is shown by the testimony of Sister Anna and the agent, Swayne, that they would not have given the three Morenci children to Dunagan, except that they then believed that the people of Morenci would not permit any of the children to be taken away by them.

It is clearly established by the proof in the case, and it is not disputed, that each of the respondents is a fit and proper person to have the care, custody, and control of the children; that they are people of sufficient means properly to care for and educate the children, and that they are fit persons, by reason of their character, standing, and age, to have and maintain such care, custody, and control; that, without exception, they have become attached to the children, and the children have become attached to them; and that each desires to retain the particular child which he has, in order that he may rear the same as one of his own household.

On the 16th of October, applications were made by the respondents to the probate court of Graham county, Arizona, for letters of guardianship of the person of the child which each possessed. Hearings were had, at which this petitioner was represented by counsel, and in each instance letters of guardianship were granted in accordance with said application, and each of said respondents duly qualified as such guardian. Thereupon this petitioner took an appeal from the order granting said letters of guardianship in each case to the district 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) court of Graham county. Pending said appeals these petitions were filed, and in response to the writs the children were brought before this court.

Messrs. Eugene S. Ives and Bennett & Williams for petitioner.

Messrs. W. C. McFarland and Bennett & Bennett for respondent.

Mr. Frederick S. Nave, amicus curiæ.

Kent, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding, though not presenting questions difficult of determination, or points of law that are novel, is unusual in many of its features, and is important as determinative of the disposition and welfare of a number of little children, ignorant of the contest that is being carried on in regard to them. Our decision will determine the question of their environment, the circumstances under which they shall be brought up, the foster parents and homes they are to have, and will affect their future probably to a greater degree than any one circumstance that can now come into their lives. The importance to them of a proper determination of this proceeding has caused us to adopt the unusual procedure of hearing the evidence orally before the full bench, and we deem it proper, although the case has only in the past few days been closed, to determine the matter now, while all the parties concerned are before the court, and to state the facts as we find them and our conclusions somewhat at length, although opportunity has not been given to formulate them other than hastily.

The question presented for our determination primarily is, What disposition of these children will be for their best interests? They are brought before us by the petitioner, claiming its legal right to their custody. The respondents appear and claim their custody, alleging also a legal right. Whether a legal right exists, either on the one side or the other, such right is not conclusive upon us; and, while it is properly a factor to be taken into consideration in determining the welfare of the children, such welfare is the controlling, vital, determinative fact.

The supreme court of Massachusetts, with that clearness of diction so frequently characteristic of its opinions, has, in the case of Woodworth v. Spring, 4 Allen, 321,—the parent case, often cited and followed,—so fully covered the law upon this subject that we deem it desirable to quote here the greater portion of that opinion. Speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Bigelow, the court in that case said: "The child whose custody is in controversy in this case is legally domiciled in the state of Illinois. That was his domicile of origin, and, as he has had hitherto no legal capacity to acquire a new one, and as the guardian appointed in the place of his origin has never intended to change the domicile of his ward, that of his birth still continues. Story, Conf. L. § 46. In determining the question of his legal custody in this commonwealth, he is therefore to be regarded as a foreign child who is lawfully within the jurisdiction of this state, having been brought within its limits not forcibly or clandestinely, but with his own consent and with that of the petitioner, his duly appointed guardian under the laws of Illinois, who had the lawful custody of his person in that state. So much seems to be clear, and, if the right to the possession and control of the person of the child depended on his domicile, the right of the petitioner to claim the custody of his person would be indisputable. But we are unable to see that the facts that the child was born in another state, and that he has never, by an act or election of his own or of his guardian, obtained a new home here, have a decisive bearing on the question at issue in the present case. He is now lawfully within the territory and under the jurisdiction of this commonwealth, and has a right to claim the protection and security which our laws afford to all persons coming within its limits, irrespective of their origin or of the place where they may be legally domiciled. Every sovereignty exercises the right of determining the status or condition of persons found within its jurisdiction. The laws of a foreign state cannot be permitted to intervene to affect the personal rights or privileges even of their own citizens while they are residing on the territory and within the jurisdiction of an independent government. Effect may be given by way of comity to such laws by the judicial tribunals of other states and countries, but ex proprio rigore they cannot have any extraterritorial force or operation. The question whether a person within the jurisdiction of a state can be removed therefrom depends not on the laws of the place whence he came or in which he may have his legal domicile, but on his rights and obligations as they are fixed and determined by the laws of the state or country in which he is found. . . . The comity of a state will give no effect to foreign laws which are inconsistent with or repugnant to its own policy, or prejudicial to the rights and interests of those who are within its jurisdiction. Even the parental relation, which is everywhere recognized, will not be deemed to carry with it any authority or control beyond that which is conferred by the laws of the country where it is exerted. The patria potestas of a foreign parent over his child is not that which is vested in him by the laws of the place of his domicile, but that which exists by virtue of the parental relation in the country where the father seeks to enforce his authority. These well-settled principles are founded on the necessity of securing and preserving to every state the exclusive sovereignty and jurisdiction within its own territory, and avoiding the confusion and conflict of rights and remedies which would ensue from attempting to give extraterritorial effect to the varying laws of different countries. Statuta suo cluduntur territorio, nec ultra territorium disponunt. Every nation has an exclusive right to regulate persons and property within its jurisdiction according to its own laws, and the principles of public policy on which its own government is founded. It results from these principles that persons exercising offices and trusts with which they are clothed by virtue of the laws of a particular state or country cannot undertake to transfer their power or capacity to act, so as to control persons or property situated beyond the limits of the jurisdiction of the government or sovereignty from which their authority is derived. An administrator appointed under the laws of a foreign state cannot act as such in this commonwealth. Nor, for like reasons, can a guardian appointed by virtue of the statutes of another state exercise any authority here over the person or property of his ward. His rights and powers are strictly local, and circumscribed by the jurisdiction of the government which clothed him with the office. Story, Conf. L. § 499. . . . So far, therefore, as the claim of the petitioner to the custody of the child in the present case rests on a supposed rightful authority to control his person in this commonwealth by virtue of his appointment as guardian in the state of Illinois, it is not supported either on principle or authority. He cannot assert his tutorial power de jure in our courts or within our territory. But it by no means follows that his claim to the care of the child and the control of his person, and to the privilege of removing him from this commonwealth, is to be absolutely denied. On the contrary, it is the duty of the courts of this state, in the exercise of that comity which recognizes the laws of other states when they are consistent with and in harmony with our own, to consider the status of guardian which the petitioner holds under the laws of another state as an important element in determining with whom the custody of the child is to continue. It would not do to say that a foreign guardian has no claim to the care or control of the person of his ward in this commonwealth. If such were the rule, a child domiciled out of the state, who was sent hither for purposes of education, or came within the state by stealth, or was brought here by force or fraud, might be emancipated from the control of his rightful guardian, duly appointed in the place of his domicile, and thus escape or be taken out of all legitimate care and custody. But in such cases the foreign guardian would not be regarded here as a stranger or intruder. His appointment in another state as guardian of an infant, with powers and duties similar to those which are by our laws vested in guardians over the persons of their wards, would entitle him to ask that the comity of friendly states having similar laws and usages should be so far recognized and exerted as to surrender to him the infant, so that he might be again restored to his full rights and powers over him, by removing him to the place of his domicile. And, if it should appear that such surrender and restoration would not debar the infant from any personal rights or privileges to which he might be entitled under our laws, and would be conducive to his welfare and promote his interests, it would be the duty of the court to award to the foreign guardian the custody of the person. . . . Nor can we see that the appointment of a guardian over the minor by the probate court in this commonwealth operates to bar any decree by this court in favor of the foreign guardian, awarding to him the custody of his ward. Such an appointment might be expedient and proper for the purpose of clothing someone in this commonwealth with authority over the person of an infant for his protection and security against any unauthorized interference or control. But it certainly would not conclusively settle his permanent status or condition, so long as he remained an infant, or prevent his being removed from the commonwealth by the guardian appointed in the place of his domicile, if the interests and welfare of the ward rendered such removal expedient or necessary. No doubt, so long as the child continues within this jurisdiction, the guardian appointed in the courts of this state would have the exclusive right to the custody of his person. But the decree of the probate court does not deprive this court of the power to adjudicate and determine the question of the proper custody of the child as between a domestic guardian and one appointed in the place of the domicile of the infant. The jurisdiction of this court to decide, on habeas corpus or other proper process, concerning the care and custody of infants, is paramount, and cannot be taken away by any decree of an inferior tribunal. . . . The result is that neither of the parties to the present proceeding can assert or maintain an absolute right to the permanent care and custody of the infant who is now before the court. But it is for this court to determine, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, having regard to the welfare and permanent good of the child, as a predominant consideration, to whose custody he shall be committed."

It will be noted that the case from which we have quoted differs from the proceeding before us, in that in the Massachusetts case the child was in that jurisdiction without the intent of its guardian to change its domicile to that state, while here the still stronger reason exists for following the doctrine enunciated, in that the petitioner, in the exercise of its custody and control over the children, voluntarily brought them to this jurisdiction, with the conceded intention of changing their domicile by placing them in the homes in this territory it then believed to be suitable ones. Following the law as we find it,—and with it we are in full accord,—we do not deem it important to the main issue to be decided to pass upon the contention of the respondents that the charter of the petitioner gives it no right either to place these children in homes, or to reclaim them for any cause after they have been so placed; that the petitioner has no rights of guardianship; that whatever rights the petitioner has have no extraterritorial force, and can avail such institution nothing outside the state of New York; that, if the petitioner has a right to place such children in homes, then admittedly it is a part of its business, and, in placing these children in the homes here, it has been carrying on such business in this territory, and, having done so without complying with the territorial laws respecting the filing of its articles and the appointment of an agent, it cannot now, under our law, maintain this proceeding, founded on such business so done here. If the subject-matter of this proceeding were other than that of the custody of children, the legal propositions advanced by the respondents would merit careful attention; but in this proceeding it is sufficient to say that we do not recognize any of them as a bar to the proceeding brought by the petitioner, and that we recognize its right to present this application, and the power of the court under this application to award the petitioner the relief it seeks, if it be for the best interests of the children so to do. Similarly, it is not necessary for us to determine whether the petitioner is correct in its position that the letters of guardianship issued to the respondents by the probate court of Graham county give the respondents no legal right to the custody of the children, for the reason that, an appeal having been taken to the district court, where a trial de novo must be had, such appeal vacates the order of appointment and the letters issued thereunder, for, if the letters be valid, and the respondents the appointed guardian thereunder, such fact is in no way controlling upon us, and is but one of the surrounding circumstances at which we should look in the interests of the children.

We hold, therefore, that, under the facts as we find them, neither the petitioner nor the respondents have any such legal claim as authorizes us for that reason to award to either of the parties the care and custody of these children. We have, then, to decide what disposition must be made of the children, to subserve best their welfare. The petitioner has frankly conceded that a great blunder was committed in the consignment and delivery of the children to these degraded half-breed Indians. The evidence satisfies us that it was an unintentional blunder on the part of the institution, and was caused by the misleading and inaccurate report of the local priest, who was not connected with the institution, and was a foreigner and unacquainted with existing conditions; that such blunder was not remedied at the time because of the tactless stubbornness of the agent, and the feeling of the sister in charge that she must bow to the authority of the priest, who insisted upon such disposition. We recognize the desire of the institution to right now, and to right itself, the wrong done these children, and to secure for them now suitable homes to be chosen by it, and, with the record of its great service to humanity in the past, we have no doubt of its purpose and ability to do so; but as, in the full light of the history of this transaction, shown by the evidence adduced at the trial, of which the institution so far away can hitherto have had but partial knowledge, it appears that the mistake, as originally made, was made by one not connected with the petitioner, and that the ultimate purpose of the institution—that of finding suitable homes for their children—has in this instance already been accomplished, we do not believe that the best interests of these children will be promoted by allowing the petitioner to adopt the course which it desires.

The counsel for petitioner has eloquently argued to us that the interests of these children will best be subserved by allowing this institution to take them to the East, and there place them in homes far removed from the knowledge of their antecedents, which by reason of the recent events has become so general where the respondents live. This argument would have great weight if we could be led to believe that a mere change of foster parentage would insure a condition of ignorance of the circumstances of their birth and desertion, either in the children when they come to years of discretion, or in the friends and families of their adoption. There can be, at most, but a chance that such would be the result. As it is, these present foster parents—persons of some means and education—from the day when, with humanitarian impulse, and actuated by motives of sympathy for their pitiful condition, they assisted in the rescue of these little children from the evil into which they had fallen, down to the time of their attendance at this trial, at cost of much time and money, in their loving care and attention, have shown that more than ordinary ties of affection bind them to these children, and that in no other homes that can be found for them are they so likely to fare as well. We feel that it is for their best interests that no change be made in their custody, and that, if anywhere, here in the changing West, the land of opportunity and hope, these children, as they grow to manhood and womanhood, will have the fullest opportunity that it is possible for them to have to be judged, not upon the unfortunate condition of birth, but upon the record they themselves shall make, and the character they shall develop.

The writ will be dismissed in this and the other cases.

Appeal dismissed by Supreme Court of United States December 3, 1906.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM KINKEAD, Plff. in Err.,
v.

C. W. TURGEON et al.

(— Neb. —, 109 N. W. 744.)

Common law—adoption.

1. By statute so much of the common law of England as is applicable and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States or the Constitution and statutes of this state is in force in this state.

Headnotes by LETTON, J.

Note.—As shown in the note to the above case upon the first hearing, which is reported in 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 762, the opinion now adopted by the court is based on sound principle, and, in view of the statutory adoption of the common law, it seems to be the only conclusion that could have been reached by the court.

Waters—title to bed.

2. Under the common law, a riparian owner of lands on one side of a navigable river above the flow of the tide holds to the thread of the stream, subject to the public easement of navigation; and, if the river suddenly changes its channel and leaves its former bed, the boundary does not change, and he still holds to the same line. This is also the rule of the civil law.

Same.

3. The common law relating to the rights of such riparian owners is applicable in this state, and is not inconsistent with the Constitution or statutes of Nebraska or the Constitution of the United States.

Same—leaving bed.

4. Where the Missouri river suddenly changes its course and abandons its former bed, the respective riparian owners are entitled to the possession and ownership of the soil formerly under its waters as far as the thread of the stream, and may maintain ejectment to oust squatters within such limits.

AN APPLICATION for a rehearing of a writ of error to the District Court for Dakota County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate in which the judgment of the lower court had been affirmed. Judgment reversed.

The statement of facts and argument of counsel appear in the report of the case on former hearing, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 762.

Letton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case are set forth in a former opinion by Oldham, C., reported in 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 762, 104 N. W. 1062. On account of the fact that at the former hearing the commissioner was not favored with an oral argument of the case; and, further, for the reason that the question involved is of great public importance, a rehearing was allowed, and the case is again presented for consideration. As was pointed out in the former opinion, the question presented is here for the first time, though cases involving the rights of riparian owners to lands formed by accretion as alluvium have heretofore been considered by the court, and in deciding some of these cases certain expressions of opinion have been incidentally made by the writers of the several opinions upon the question here presented. In none of them, however, was the determination of this question necessary to the disposition of the case, nor was any argument made or authorities presented upon the point. In Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. 45 Neb. 802, 64 S. W. 239, the writer 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of the opinion indicates his personal views upon this question, but, since the case expressly holds that the Republican river is not a navigable stream, the expression was purely obiter. In Crawford Co. v. Hathaway (Crawford Co. v. Hall) 67 Neb. 325, 60 L.R.A. 889, 108 Am. St. Rep. 647, 93 N. W. 781, opinion by Holcomb, J., the writer of the opinion says: "Whether the common-law rule fixing the rights of riparian proprietors applies to the larger streams of the state such as may be classed as interstate rivers, and along the banks of which meander lines have been run by the government in its survey of the public lands, presents an entirely different question, and it would seem that riparian rights would not attach to the waters of such rivers. A final determination of the question, however, is not here made, as this should be left to be decided in a proper case where the subject is fairly presented and considered after opportunity for thorough investigation aided by the researches and arguments of counsel." It will be seen, therefore, that we approach the question unhampered by any previous adjudication.

There is an irreconcilable conflict between the decisions of the courts of different states of this country upon this question. From a somewhat extended examination of the various opinions, the writer believes that much of the confusion has resulted partly from a mistaken idea as to what the Supreme Court of the United States has decided upon the question, partly from an idea that meander lines in maps of original surveys limited and bounded the estate of the riparian owner by the bank of the stream, and partly from a mistaken idea of the necessities of the case, based upon the differences in length, volume, and navigability of the great rivers of America above tide water as compared with the inconsiderable extent of those English rivers which are navigable both above and below the flow of the tide. See Mobile v. Eslava, 9 Port. (Ala.) 578, 33 Am. Dec. 325; McManus v. Carmichael, 3 Iowa, 56; Cooley v. Golden, 117 Mo. 33, 21 L.R.A. 300, 23 S. W. 100. The statute of this state provides: "So much of the common law of England as is applicable and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, with the organic law of this territory, or with any law passed or to be passed by the legislature of this territory, is adopted and declared to be the law within said territory." Cobbey's Anno. Stat. 1903. § 6950. In this connection we have said: "The power of the courts to declare established doctrines of the common law inapplicable to this state should be used somewhat sparingly, and its exercise is not to be justified unless the inapplicability of the rule is general, extending to the whole or the greater part of the state, or at least to an area capable of a definite judicial ascertainment. . . . The common-law rules as to the rights and duties of riparian owners are in force in every part of the state except as altered or modified by statutes." Meng v. Coffee, 67 Neb. 500, 60 L.R.A. 910, 108 Am. St. Rep. 697, 93 N. W. 713; Slatery v. Harley, 58 Neb. 575, 79 N. W. 151. The statutory provision above set forth has been in force in the territory and state of Nebraska for over fifty years, and during that period of more than half a century the courts have declared the common law inapplicable in but few instances, and in several of the instances that portion of the common law held inapplicable to our changed conditions has been that part thereof consisting of statutes enacted long before the American Revolution. Meng v. Coffee, supra. The cases in which the applicability of the common law as to the rights of riparian owners has been challenged heretofore in this state have all been concerned with the subject of the rights of the riparian owner to the unimpaired use of the water in the stream in resistance to a right claimed by appropriators to take it for purposes of irrigation or power, and the language used in Meng v. Coffee, supra, and other cases dealing with the same subject, while declaring as a general rule the supremacy of the common-law doctrine, is hardly applicable upon the question here presented, for, when deciding that the right of the riparian owner to the use of the running water in a stream was superior to the right of a person seeking to divert the water from the stream for irrigation purposes, it can hardly be said that the court had in mind the question here presented as to the right of a riparian owner to an abandoned river bed of a navigable stream. We think the question, therefore, must be considered open and not settled by the prior decisions. They are worthy of consideration, however, and must be given weight as determining the question of the rejection of the common-law rule.

The questions, then, necessary for determination in this case, are: First, What is the common law of England as to the rights of riparian proprietors in such a case as this? and, second, Are the provisions of the common law applicable, and, if applicable, are they in any way inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, with the organic law of this state, or with any law passed by the legislature of this state? These being the questions presented, it is obvious that the weight to be attached to the opinions of the courts of other states upon the question of the rights of riparian proprietors in an abandoned river bed depends upon how far the Constitution and statutes of such state correspond with those of this state, as well as upon the persuasiveness of the reasoning set forth in the opinions.

Under the common law of England the title to the bed of the sea below high-water mark, and to the bed of all rivers as far as the flow of the tide extended, was in the Crown, but the riparian owners of all freshwater rivers above the ebb and flow of the tide, whether navigable or non-navigable, where the river formed the boundary between adjoining proprietors, was in the riparian owner to the thread of the stream. Lord Hale, De Jure Maris, Hargrave's Law Tracts, 5; King v. Wharton, 12 Mod. 510; Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 35 L. ed. 428, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 808, 838; Farnham, Waters, § 48; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 331, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 549. Chancellor Kent says: "The right of sovereignty in public rivers above the flow of the tide is the same as in tide waters; they are juris publici, except that the proprietors adjoining such rivers own the soil, ad filum aquæ. But grants of land, bounded on rivers, or upon the margins of the same, or along the same, above tide water, carry the exclusive right and title of the grantee to the center of the stream, unless the terms of the grant clearly denote the intention to stop at the edge or margin of the river, and the public, in cases where the river is navigable for boats and rafts, have an easement therein, or a right of passage, subject to the jus publicum as a public highway. The proprietors of the adjoining banks have a right to use the land and water of the river, as regards the public, in any way not inconsistent with the easement." 3 Kent, Com. p. 427. This also is the rule of the civil law. Ware, Roman Water Law, §§ 22, 94. There appears, then, to be no controversy as to what constitutes the common law of England in regard to fresh waters or navigable rivers above the flow of the tide. Some of the cases in this country fail to draw a distinction between the rule of the common law with reference to rivers which are navigable in fact above the flow of the tide, and those navigable only where the tide flows, and adopted the idea that by the common law no rivers were navigable, or considered navigable, in law, except those in which the tide rose and fell. Comparing, then, the diminutive size and length and volume of the rivers of England with the magnificent waterways of this country, it was held that the common law as to navigable rivers was inapplicable to the situation in this country, and that our great rivers, which are navigable in fact for hundreds or perhaps thousands of miles, are to be treated in law as were navigable rivers of England, meaning thereby the rivers in which the flow of the tide was perceptible. Much reasoning has been indulged in, based upon the apparent disproportion of the rivers of England and America, to show the necessity of abrogating the common-law rule on account of the actual navigability of our rivers above tide water. However, the rule of the common law has been adopted in Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Illinois, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, New Jersey, partly in New York, and in Ohio, South Carolina, and Wisconsin. It is rejected in Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Texas, Tennessee, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Oregon, Nevada, and California. In some of the states which reject the rule the dejection is based upon the system of land surveys of the United States, it being held that where, in the original survey, the boundary next the stream is meandered, the government has parted with its title only to the extent of the meander line, and has reserved to itself, or to the state which afterwards was created, the title to the bed of the stream. Later decisions of the United States Supreme Court, however, have settled that the meander line along the bank of a navigable river is not a monument of title or boundary line, but merely marks the place where the water flowed at the time of the survey (Hardin v. Jordan, supra; Jefferis v. East Omaha Land Co. 134 U. S. 178, 33 L. ed. 872, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518); and the doctrine of that court now is that, by the admission of the several states, whatever right or title the United States had to the bed of such navigable streams passed to the state government, and that the local law of each state determines the question whether the bed of such streams belongs to the state or to the riparian owner (Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224; St. Louis v. Myers, 113 U. S. 566, 28 L. ed. 1131, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 640; Hardin v. Jordan, supra; St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co. v. St. Paul Water Comrs. 168 U. S. 349, 42 L. ed. 497, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 157). These decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States conclusively establish the fact, therefore, that the common law with reference to riparian ownership in navigable streams is not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States nor with the organic law of this state, and, since no law upon this subject has been passed by the legislature of the territory of Nebraska or of the state of Nebraska, the common law is not inconsistent with the statutory law of the state.

The only remaining question, then, is whether or not the common-law rule is applicable to the conditions in this state with reference to the rights of riparian owners upon the Missouri river. As to a portion of such riparian rights this court has already spoken. We have held that the rights of riparian owners upon the Missouri river to land formed by accretion are the same as if the river were not navigable, and that the common law applies in full force. Gill v. Lydick, 40 Neb. 508, 59 N. W. 104. The same doctrine has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Jefferis v. East Omaha Land Co. 134 U. S. 178, 33 L. ed. 872, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518, citing Jones v. Soulard, 24 How. 41, 16 L. ed. 604, and other cases. In passing upon the applicability of the common law to our conditions in the first place it is well to observe that for upwards of half a century the people of the territory of Nebraska and the state of Nebraska have been in occupancy of the west bank of the Missouri river. The first settlement of the territory was along the Missouri river, and its fertile valley has been the home of thrifty farmers ever since. It is a matter of public knowledge, of which the court will take judicial notice, that that great river in this locality takes its course through a wide valley composed in the main of loose, sandy, and friable soil of great fertility; that it is subject to annual floods, sometimes of great extent and volume; that its course is erratic and tortuous; that sometimes, during flood periods, its current will strike, or impinge upon its banks at such an angle and with such effect as, even in a single day, to undermine the same and cause large masses of soil to fall into the stream and be disintegrated, and thus whole farms are swallowed up with almost inconceivable rapidity, while in other localities hundreds of acres are often added to its banks by the process of accretion. It is further a matter of common knowledge that at a number of points along the northern and western boundary of the state the river has, as in this case, cut across the neck of a peninsula, entirely abandoned its old bed, and left the former peninsula with the abandoned bed entirely across the river upon the eastern or northern bank and thus physically dissevered from the state of Nebraska and conjoined to Dakota, Iowa, or Missouri. See Nebraska v. Iowa, 143 U. S. 359, 36 L. ed. 186, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396; Missouri v. Nebraska, 196 U. S. 23, 49 L. ed. 372, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 155. These processes have been going on for fifty years. During the whole period of time the state of Nebraska has existed it has never asserted any title or dominion over the abandoned river bed, but has left the riparian owner in full possession and control of the same to the thread of the stream, and many fertile farms now occupy the place where the waters once flowed. When the river abandoned the bed the riparian owner occupied it, claiming title thereto, and, as fast as it became subject to useful purposes, reclaimed it for agriculture. For so long a period, therefore, it has been considered by the authorities of the state of Nebraska that the common law is applicable to the conditions along the Missouri river, and the fact of this administrative construction of the law by the state authorities, extending over so many years, is entitled to great, if not controlling, weight upon this question. No evil consequences have been pointed out to us in the brief of defendants in error which are liable to occur to the public welfare by the continuance of this policy, nor are we able to discern wherein there is any such change in conditions from those which have so long prevailed along this boundary which would warrant the court in giving a new construction to the rights of riparian proprietors than that which has been, at least tacitly, given by the public authorities for so long a time. Further, we see nothing in this doctrine which in any wise impairs or interferes with the public right of navigation over these waters. It is true that, while the Missouri river has been declared by Congress to be a navigable stream, and while for many years during the early history of the great Northwest its waters furnished almost the only channel of communication between the settled portions of the United States and the vast territory lying along its course and around its headwaters, still, in later years, while intermittent attempts have been made to re-establish the river as a highway of commerce, the difficulties and disadvantages caused by its rapid current, its variable, erratic, and inconstant course, and the crumbling nature of the soil upon its banks have been so great that commerce has abandoned its waters and betaken itself to the more reliable, though perhaps more expensive, method of transportation by rail. Theoretically, therefore, the Missouri river is a navigable stream along the Nebraska boundary. Practically at the present time its usefulness as a public waterway has departed. However, in the consideration of this case we have treated it as if it were practically navigable, because, while improbable, it is not impossible that at some time in the future, under changed conditions, these waters may again become a channel of communication and intercourse.

We have seen that the common-law rights of riparian owners as to accretions along the bank of this river are in force in this state, and it is a fact within the personal observation of the writer of this opinion that at some points on the boundary of this state, by virtue of the rapid accretions which sometimes take place along this stream, the present channel of the river is removed to a distance of more than a mile from where it was thirty years ago. If no injury is done to the public right by reason of the rapid and numerous changes of the channel of the Missouri river by the action of accretion, by the growth of sandbars and islands, and the gradual filling up of the intervening space between them and the bank, by which changes the bed where the river actually flowed is even more fully and effectually abandoned than where, by a sudden change, the river has left its bed and sought a new one, how can the public be in any wise injured by the latter form of abandonment? The effect is the same in both cases. Along the Missouri river the change of the bed to dry land in the case of accretion is sometimes even more rapidly performed than the changes of the abandoned bed to dry land in the case of avulsion, for in such case the abandoned bed is usually full of water, which gradually evaporates and which in many instances forms lakes which stand for years, occasionally filled again by the river in flood periods, a number of these "cut-off lakes," as they are locally termed, extending from 3 to 8 or 10 miles long, and occupying practically the whole of the abandoned bed for many years.

The fact that the rights of riparian owners are preserved ad filum aquæ is not inconsistent with, and does not interfere with, the right of navigation. The public retains its easement of the right of passage along and over the waters of the river as a public highway. This is the interest of the public in connection with such rivers which is paramount, and which is, and should be, protected by the courts. If, however, the river ceases to be navigable at any particular point, whether by gradual filling up of its old bed or a part of it by the process of accretion, or by a sudden change of its bed by the carving out of a new channel, the public right attaches to the waters of the new channel to the same extent as it did while it flowed in the former bed. The public then has lost nothing by the change of channel. All its rights have been retained. As was said long ago by Ulpian: "In like manner, if a river leaves its bed and begins to flow elsewhere, whatever is done in the old bed is not subject to the interdict, because not done in a public river, as the bed belongs to the neighbors on each side, or else the bed belongs to the occupant if he has fields marked off thereon. Certainly the bed ceases to be public. Also the new channel which the river has made, although it was private, begins, nevertheless, to be public, because it is impossible that the channel of a public river should not be public. (D. 43, 12, 1, 7.)" Ware, Roman Water Law, § 22, p. 34. To hold otherwise in case of a stream of the characteristics of the Missouri river might well lead, by way of repeated changes of the river's channel, to additions to the public domain at the expense of adjoining proprietors. For example, if in this case we should hold that the bed of the abandoned stream belonged to the state of Nebraska by the same reasoning the bed of the new channel belongs to the state, and if the river should again change its channel nearby by another avulsion, thus leaving the new bed dry, the state then would be the owner of the land in two abandoned river beds and also of the bed of the new channel. The property in the second and third bed then would be wrested without compensation from the property of private individuals. A doctrine which might work such an injustice as this ought never to be adopted by a court if any other view is reasonable. The interest of the public in the waters and bed of a navigable river is analogous to that of the public in a public road. It has the right of passage over the stream as it had over the road. The owner of the land abutting upon a public road can do nothing in any way to interfere with the rights of the public in the same, nor can the riparian owner on the banks of a navigable stream exercise any dominion over its waters or over the bed thereof in any manner inconsistent with, or opposed to, the public easement. When the public entirely abandons a public road either by virtue of nonuser or by its vacation through proper proceedings, it does not retain the title to the land over which the easement of travel existed, but it reverts to the adjoining owners to the middle of the road. And so with a navigable river of this class. When, by reason of natural changes, the stream abandons the bed over which, through the instrumentality of its waters, the public has the right to pass, the right of passage is as effectually abandoned at that point as when a road is vacated and a new one opened to take its place. The right of the public is to travel in the new road; and its right and privilege to pass over the old reverts to the abutting owners; and so with the river, the public right of navigation attaches to the new channel of the stream by virtue of the change of its waters, over which alone the right of navigation can exist, and the abandoned bed, which is of no avail for public use as a means of travel, reverts to the riparian owners to the thread of the channel where the waters flowed.

For these reasons we are satisfied that the common law as to the rights of riparian owners to the abandoned channel of a navigable fresh-water stream is applicable in Nebraska, and not inconsistent with our laws or Constitution, and that, therefore, the plaintiff is the owner of the property in controversy in this action.

We have not deemed it necessary to cite or particularize more than a few of the large number of cases bearing upon the proposition hereinbefore discussed. They may be found collated and distinguished in Farnham on Waters; Gould on Waters; in note to English Ruling Cases, vol. 23, p. 158; in American & English Enc. Law, 2d ed., as well as in other standard works of reference. In several instances the courts of a state lying upon the one side of one of our great rivers hold and enforce the rule of the common law, and on the other side of the same river the courts of a sister state declare that the riparian owner only takes to high-water or low-water mark, as the case may be. On the whole matter, we deem it best to let well enough alone and adhere to the custom and policy of this state since its earliest settlement.

The former opinion in this case is set aside, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF DURHAM et al.

ENO COTTON MILLS, Appt.

(141 N. C. 615, 54 S. E. 453.)

Water—pollution—injunction.

1. An inconsiderable pollution of a river at a point 17 miles above the intake of a city water supply will not be enjoined as a nuisance in the absence of any analy-

Case Note. — Power of legislature to forbid pollution of stream from which municipal water supply is taken: — As appears from the note to State v. Griffin, 41 L.R.A. 177, and 1 Farnham, Waters, 618. the legislatures have assumed the right to prevent the casting of polluting material into streams from which municipal water supplies are taken, and the courts have upheld them in so doing. Even the position of the court in DURHAM v. ENO COTTON MILLS, that the legislature may forbid such pollution without infringing the constitutional rights of the riparian owners, although no injury to the public health or comfort is actually shown, is supported by State v. Streeper, 5 N. J. L. J. 115, and State ex rel. Board of Health v. Diamond Mills Paper Co. 63 N. J. Eq. 111, 51 Atl. 1019, which hold that the fact that the stream purifies itself before reaching the intake of the waterworks of the municipality is no defense to a prosecution for violation of the statute. The constitutional sis of the water at the point of intake merely upon opinion evidence that the pollution affects the water at that point.

Same—statutory prohibition—construction.

2. A statutory provision forbidding the discharge of sewage into a river from which a public drinking-water supply is taken is not limited by other provisions of the same statute establishing for inspection purposes a watershed extending 15 miles above the point of intake of such supply.

Same—health law.

3. The legislature may, under its police power, forbid the discharge of unpurified sewage into a river from which a public drinking-water supply is taken, without infringing the constitutional rights of the riparian owner, although no injury to the public health or comfort is actually shown.

Same—other source of supply.

4. The availability of another water supply will not prevent the operation of a statute forbidding the casting of sewage into a river from which a public drinking-water supply is taken.

(May 28, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Superior Court for Durham County enjoining the pollution of a river. Affirmed.

Statement by Walker, J.:

Civil action, heard at chambers upon a motion for an injunction. The action was brought for the purpose of enjoining the defendant from emptying its sewage into the waters of the Eno river, from which stream the plaintiffs allege the water supply of the city of Durham is obtained partly in the summer months. The material parts of the complaint are as follows: That the defendant owns and operates a cotton factory located about 300 feet from the Eno river, at the town of Hillsboro, in Orange county, North Carolina, and employs in and about its factory about 300 operatives; that said defendant maintains water-closets in its said factory for the use of its said operatives, and the deposits of human excrement therefrom are flowed and discharged through an 8-inch terra cotta sewer pipe directly into the Eno river, at a point about 300 feet from said factory; that at times said sewer pipe becomes choked and stopped up, and then said deposits of excrement and sewage are run through an open ditch and small drain into said Eno river at about the point of discharge of said sewer pipe above mentioned; that it also maintains, in connection with its said closets and system of sewage, a manhole or brick chamber, which is just outside of said factory, which said manhole or brick chamber frequently overflows on soundness of the latter decisions, however, may be subject to some question. One of the rights of a riparian owner by reason of his location upon the banks of a stream is to make use of the water to such extent as he can without creating a nuisance to his neighbors or to the public. This right includes the casting of a certain amount of pollution into the stream. 1 Farnham, Waters, 288. This principle is well illustrated by the case of Missouri v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 496, 50 L. ed. 572, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 268, in which the Supreme Court of the United States, proceeding on common-law grounds, refused to enjoin the state of Illinois from casting polluting material into the stream because Missouri had not shown that it created a nuisance of which it could complain. This being the common-law right of the riparian owner, it is a property right the same as any other of the rights which grow out of use or enjoyment of his land. The Constitution provides that his property rights shall not be taken from him without compensation or due process of law. It would seem that the arbitrary declaration by the legislature that he should no longer enjoy this property right, without anything to show that it was necessary for the public health, was surely a deprivation of property, and that it was without compensation and without due process of law. The private property right gives way when it becomes an injury to the rights of other private owners or to the public; in other words, when it becomes a nuisance. And, unless the fact of the nuisance is established, the statutory deprivation of the right would seem to conflict with the constitutional rights. The reasoning in DURHAM v. ENO COTTON MILLS to the contrary is not entirely satisfactory. The court cites Atty. Gen. v. Cockermouth Local Board, L. R. 18 Eq. 172. It is needless to suggest that, there being no constitutional protection against the arbitrary exercise of power by Parliament, English decisions are of no value in this country, upon constitutional questions. And the suggestion quoted from State v. Wheeler, 44 N. J. L. 88, that to limit the legislation to cases where actual injury has occurred would be to deprive it of its most effective force, while true so far as it goes, does not meet the situation under discussion. If the nuisance was established there could be no claim that no relief could be had until injury had occurred. But the contention might be advanced with great force that the act of the riparian owner could not be stopped until the fact of nuisance, if not established, was made exceedingly probable. And where, as in the New Jersey cases cited above, it appeared or was admitted that the stream had purified itself before the intake of the municipal water supply was reached, it would seem that the necessity for public regulation under the police power ceased, and that therefore the action of the legislature was arbitrary and unconstitutional. The fact of public necessity being the basis of the police power, that fact should be apparent to justify an exercise of the power.

account of the choked condition of the said discharge pipe, and the overflow therefrom is deposited on the ground at and around said manhole, and is washed into said Eno river; that said defendant also discharges large quantities of dye waste on the ground just outside of its said factory, which flows and empties into said river near the point where defendant's said sewer pipe empties; that said defendant owns about sixty dwelling houses, located on both sides of said Eno river, and on its watershed, which are occupied by the operatives in defendant's said factory, and maintains in connection with said dwelling houses a large number of open privies without a tub system, some of which said privies are within 100 feet of said Eno river, and that the fecal matter from said privies is washed by the rains into the said Eno river; that the said city of Durham and its inhabitants are now and have been for the past seventeen or eighteen years supplied with drinking water from a plant which is located on Eno river at a point a few miles below defendant's said factory, and that the public drinking-water supply of the city of Durham and its inhabitants is taken from said Eno river at said plant; that the city of Durham has demanded of the said defendant that it provide some other method of disposing of its sewage and dye waste, and other dangerous and foul matter, and that it discontinue to empty and discharge the same into the said Eno river, all of which said defendant has refused and still refuses to do, but, on the contrary, wilfully, negligently, unlawfully, and in disregard of the comfort, safety, and health of the inhabitants of the city of Durham and of the plaintiff, T. A. Mann, is flowing and discharging its raw sewage into said Eno river, from which the public drinking-water supply of the city of Durham is taken, without having said sewage passed through some well-known system of sewage purification approved by the state board of health, or any other system of purification, and has avowed its purpose to continue to do so; that, as plaintiffs are informed and believe, the waters of the said Eno river have become and are now being polluted and made unfit for drinking purposes, and that the health of the inhabitants of the city of Durham and of the plaintiff, T. A. Mann, are seriously menaced because of the acts of said defendant complained of above. The prayer is for a perpetual injunction. His Honor granted a restraining order, with an order to show cause why an injunction to the hearing should not be issued.

The plaintiff, in support of the allegations of its complaint, filed several affidavits of physicians to the effect that the sewage, dye waste, and other deleterious matter which are discharged into the river from the defendant's premises at Hillsboro, not only pollute the stream at that place, but will, in the opinion of the witnesses, pollute it at the place of intake near Durham where the plant of the waterworks company is located. Affidavits were also filed which tended to show that large quantities of feculent matter and dye waste are daily discharged into the river from the defendant's premises. It is not necessary to set forth the statements of these affidavits more fully, as they are quite sufficient to show that the water of the Eno river at Hillsboro is polluted by the acts of the defendant, and that one of the principal sources of such pollution is the daily deposit into the river of the contents of the defendant's sewer, and this is not only not denied by the defendant, but expressly admitted. One physician, whose affidavit was read by the plaintiff, expressed the opinion that the conditions at defendant's mill had much to do with the presence of typhoid fever in Durham and with the impurities found in the water supply of the said city, and that, if there should be typhoid fever among the defendant's mill operatives, it is more than probable that it would be communicated to the inhabitants of Durham through the water, and cause a serious epidemic, if present conditions are allowed to be continued. No evidence was offered by plaintiff tending to show that an analysis of any kind had been made of the water at the point of the intake near Durham to ascertain if there had been, in fact, any pollution of the stream at that place. The defendant, while admitting the pollution of the river at its mill site near Hillsboro, denies that it extends to the waters at the intake of the water company, near Durham. In support of this denial it offers proof of the following facts: The volume of sewage conveyed into the river is very small compared with the volume of water into which it flows. The sewage pipe is only 8 inches in diameter and empties 18 miles above the water company's intake. The excreta are carried through the pipe by the flushing of the closets with fresh water, to the river 200 yards distant, and by the time of arrival at the outlet of the sewer the solid matter is practically dissolved. The sewage then passes immediately into the "upper reaches of a pond," which extends $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles below the mill, and there are two other ponds below, and four backwaters of former ponds, with their dams now broken. There is necessarily sedimentation, which is a means of precipitation recognized by all the authorities upon the subject. In the stretch below the defendant's discharge pipe and the intake of the water company are numerous spring branches, creeks, and brooks of fresh and pure water flowing into the Eno river millions of gallons every twenty-four hours. Thus dilution takes place, another recognized means of precipitation. That the flow of sewage is not only small, as already alleged, but is never constant. The dyestuffs are discharged into an open drain at said mills after their coloring matter has been as much as possible removed, and little of the dye makes its way to the river, and not enough to discolor the water, and that none of it, as defendant is informed, would be injurious to health. That a flowing stream constantly renewed from its sources and the accessions from other water courses, and the interruptions of the current of this river by ponds and backwaters as described would give the water polluted at the mouth of the sewer and drain ample time, considering the distance to be traversed, to become chemically and bacteriologically pure before it reaches the intake. The defendant also alleges that while the water company's plant was located on the Eno river before its mill was built near Hillsboro yet that water was not taken from the stream for the purpose of supplying the city of Durham until three or four years after the defendant began to discharge sewage into the river and otherwise to use its premises as stated in the complaint. It further avers that the plaintiff could have an abundant supply of pure water from Nancy Rhodes's branch, if the water company had not carelessly and negligently permitted its pond, which is supplied by that branch, to fill so that the volume of water it could have held was greatly diminished, and that the water company of the city of Durham can easily obtain a sufficient supply of pure water from two or more creeks conveniently located. That a plant for purifying sewage could be erected at defendant's mill only at great expense, and would add nothing to the purity of the water at the intake of the water company, while the water company could at little expense rid the water of any impurities which it might gather as it flows and carry along with it to the intake. It is further averred that the water company has not a sufficient settling reservoir at its plant. There are other matters stated in the affidavits of the respective parties, but it is not necessary that they should be set forth.

The presiding judge made the following finding of facts and the following order thereon: "This cause coming on to be heard by consent in the city of Durham, on the 10th day of February, 1905, and being heard upon the affidavits filed, after argument of counsel, it appears to me from said affidavits filed in the cause: That the Durham Water Company, a corporation, supplies water to the city of Durham for the use of its citizens for drinking and other purposes. That the water with which said city of Durham is supplied, for a considerable portion of the year, is taken from the Nancy Rhodes branch, a tributary of Eno river, but that when the waters become low, during the summer and other seasons, when there is not much rain, the Nancy Rhodes branch does not afford a sufficient supply for the needs of the city of Durham and its inhabitants, and on such occasions and for such times the water has been taken from Eno river and conveyed through pipes to the city and used by the inhabitants for drinking and other purposes. Eno river is a stream some 7 miles from the city of Durham; has its source in Orange county, and flows by the town of Hillsboro and the mill settlement of the defendant, the Eno Cotton Mills, which are situated near the town of Hillsboro and close to, some 300 yards from, the river, and about 17 miles above the intake of water for the plaintiff, and the city of Durham. The defendant, the Eno Cotton Mills, is a corporation, and has a large plant near the Eno river, as above set out, in which it employs 300 or more operatives, and has dwellings on or near the bank of said Eno river for the occupancy of its operatives and their families. That in said mill are water-closets, for the use of its operatives. That the discharge from said closets is conveyed, in its raw state, through terra cotta pipes and open drains, into Eno river, and the refuse of dyestuffs from the said mill is emptied out on the ground and flows and is washed into the river. That the operatives at their dwellings use privies, from which once a week the excrement is hauled off and buried. That the discharge from said mills and the dwellings of said operatives flow into Eno river and pollute and render unwholesome the water of the river at the place of discharge of said sewage and for some distance below said mill. It further appears, from the said affidavits filed, that the pollution of the water of said river, by reason of the discharge from said mills, continues to such an extent down to the intake of the water supply for the city of Durham as to render the water less wholesome, and in case of an epidemic at said mill, such as typhoid fever, would be dangerous to the health of the citizens of Durham using water from said river for drinking purposes. The defendant has used no precautions to prevent polluting the water of Eno river, and does not propose to do so. The Durham Water Company established its plant on Eno river, 7 miles from the city, before the defendant constructed its mills or built its plant, but did not use the water of the river for its supply of water to the citizens of Durham until after the defendant built its plant and had its mill in operation with the same system of sewage and same method for the disposition of its dyestuff and the human excrement as now used,—with like pollution of the stream. It further appears from said affidavits that the water now being used by the citizens of Durham is supplied from Nancy Rhodes's branch and that the flow of said branch in all probability will be sufficient to supply the inhabitants of the city of Durham until the summer months, and that said water is pure, but that when the dry weather comes, and the streams become low, the flow of Nancy Rhodes's branch will not be sufficient to supply the city with water, and then the water for such supply will necessarily in part have to be taken from the Eno river. It is therefore considered, ordered, and adjudged that the restraining order heretofore issued be suspended in its operation until the 20th day of April, 1906, in order that the defendant, in the meantime, may provide some well-known system of sewage purification, to be approved by the state board of health; that from and after the 20th day of April, 1906, the defendant, its agents, servants, and employees, under its control, is and shall be restrained from flowing or discharging any sewage into said Eno river until the same shall have passed through some well-known system of sewage purification approved by the state board of health; and from depositing human excrement and dyestuff on the watershed of the Eno river at Hillsboro, so near to said river that the same shall flow or be washed into said river until the final hearing of this action." From this order the defendant appealed.

Messrs. S. M. Gattis, John W. Graham, and Frank Nash, for appellant:

The legislature cannot compel the defendant, after the location and use of the Eno river for the natural purposes of drainage for many years, now to put in "a well-known system of sewerage, approved by the state board of health," without any compensation, at the suit of one who is not a lower riparian owner, and is located several miles from the stream.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application for an injunction to restrain the defendant from polluting the Eno river, which, it appears, is in part the source of supply to the city of Durham of water for drinking and other purposes, requiring it to be kept free from impurities. The plaintiffs, although they have stated but one cause of action, base their right to relief upon two grounds: (1) That, as the water supply of Durham is obtained partly from the Eno river at a place on that stream where the water company's plant is located, it has the rights in the water of the river of a riparian proprietor. (2) That, if this is not so, it has the right to have the defendant enjoined from polluting the waters of the river under the recent act of the general assembly (Revisal 1905, § 3051), which reads as follows: "No person or municipality shall flow or discharge sewage into any drain, brook, creek, or river from which a public drinking-water supply is taken, unless the same shall have been passed through some well-known system of sewage purification approved by the state board of health; and the continual flow and discharge of such sewage may be enjoined upon application of any person." This enactment, in connection with the fact alleged, that the city of Durham actually draws its water supply at a certain season of the year from the Eno river, is claimed to confer upon it the right to enjoin any act of the defendant in violation of the statute which tends to contaminate the water of the river at the outlet of its sewer near Hillsboro, where its cotton factory is situated. We will consider these questions in their order.

It is well settled by the authorities that at common law the riparian owner has the right to have the natural stream of water flow by or through his land in its ordinary, natural state, both as to its quantity and quality, as incident to the ownership of the land by or through which the water course runs, and that right continues, unless it has been lost or in some degree abridged by adverse user or by grant. This, it must be understood, is not an absolute and unlimited right, but the principle, as thus stated, should be qualified so as not to interfere with the equal rights of other upper and lower proprietors on the same stream. The riparian right, therefore, expressed with greater accuracy, is to have the stream to flow by or through the land in its ordinary purity and quantity without any unnecessary or unreasonable diminution or pollution of the stream by the owners above. The several proprietors along the course of the stream have no property in the flowing water itself, which is indivisible, and not the subject of riparian ownership, but each one may use it as it comes to his land for any purpose to which it can be applied without material injury to the just rights of others. This right to the use of water in its natural flow is not an easement, nor is it merely an appurtenance, but it is something inseparably annexed to the soil itself, and exists jure naturæ as parcel of the land. We think these principles will be found to be sustained by the authorities upon the subject. Gould, Waters, §§ 204-224; Mason v. Hill, 5 Barn. & Ad. 1; Wood v. Waud, 3 Exch. 748; Stockport Waterworks Co. v.

Potter, 7 Hurlst. & N. 160; Wilts & B. Canal Nav. Co. v. Swindon Waterworks Co. L. R. 9 Ch. 451, L. R. 7 H. L. 697; 1 Farnham, Waters, §§ 62-65; Baltimore v. Warren Mfg. Co. 59 Md. 96. In Prentice v. Geiger, 74 N. Y. 345, the doctrine is thus stated: "The use of the water, as it passes, is the only right which, in the nature of things, he [the riparian proprietor] can have in it, and he acquires no exclusive right beyond its actual appropriation. But, as all proprietors on the stream have an equal right to the use of the water and to share in the benefits from its use, the right of the several owners is not an absolute, but a qualified, one, and the use of each must be such as is consistent with the substantial preservation of the equal rights of others. There are some uses which by common consent a riparian owner may have of the water, as it flows upon his premises, although such use may to some extent interfere with the use of the stream in its natural flow by the proprietors below. As, for example, the proprietor above may use the water for domestic purposes—the watering of cattle and the like—although such use may diminish the volume of the stream to the detriment of lower proprietors. The right to such uses, without which all beneficial use of the water by the riparian owner would be prevented, is allowed ex necessitate, and is universally recognized." The court, in Wilts & B. Canal Nav. Co. v. Swindon Waterworks Co. supra, says: "All streams, however, are publici juris, and all the water flowing down any stream is for the common use of mankind who live on the banks of the stream; and therefore any person living on the banks of the stream has an undoubted right to the use of the water for himself, his family, and his cattle, and for all ordinary domestic purposes, such as brewing, washing, and so on. Those are the common purposes of water in the ordinary mode of using water." The principle is well stated in Strobel v. Kerr Salt Co. 164 N. Y. at page 320, 51 L.R.A. at page 694, 79 Am. St. Rep. at page 651, and 58 N. E. at page 147, as follows: "A riparian owner is entitled to a reasonable use of the water flowing by his premises in a natural stream, as an incident to his ownership of the soil, and to have it transmitted to him without sensible alteration in quality or unreasonable diminution in quantity. While he does not own the running water, he has the right to a reasonable use of it as it passes his land. As all other owners on the same stream have the same right, the right of no one is absolute, but is qualified by the right of the others to have the stream substantially preserved in its natural size, flow, and purity, and to protection against material diversion or pollution. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

This is the common right of all, which must not be interfered with by any. The use by each must, therefore, be consistent with the rights of others, and the maxim of Sic utere tuo observed by all. The rule of the ancient common law is still in force; aqua currit et debet currere, ut currere solebat."

After all that can be said, the question is whether the upper riparian proprietor is engaged in the reasonable exercise of his right to use the stream as it flows by or through his land, whether with or without retaining the water for a time or obstructing temporarily the accustomed flow, and whether he is so doing, as the above authorities show, is a question for the jury, under the proper guidance of the court as to the law applicable to the particular state of facts. Hayes v. Waldron, 44 N. H. 580, 84 Am. Dec. 105; Strobel v. Kerr Salt Co. supra. But, in order that this right to have the water of a stream flow with undiminished quantity or unimpaired quality may be successfully asserted, the person who sets up a claim to its enjoyment must show that he is a riparian proprietor, or that in some way he has acquired riparian rights in the stream. There is nothing in this case, as now presented, which tends to prove that the plaintiffs are riparian proprietors in respect to the Eno river. They do not allege that the city of Durham is the owner of any part of the banks of that stream, but, on the contrary, the proof tends to show that it is not. The Durham Water Company has a plant abutting on the river and has been using its waters for some years to supply the city of Durham, but that company, for some unexplained reason, has not been made a party to this suit, nor does it appear even by inference what kind of contract it has with the city for furnishing water. As to all of these matters we are left without any information. It would seem, therefore, that we cannot proceed to administer relief to the plaintiffs by enjoining the acts of the defendant, if this case is treated simply as one for the suppression of a nuisance, unless we had more definite allegation and proof as to the right of the plaintiffs to maintain this action, without the presence in the record of the water company as a party. We express, though, no decided opinion as to this feature of the case, as we find it unnecessary to do so. Assuming that the city of Durham is a riparian owner or has riparian rights in the river, we yet think that the plaintiffs' proof falls short of being sufficient for the court to interpose at this stage of the case a preliminary injunction and restrain the defendant until the hearing from continuing to commit the acts alleged to be injurious to the plaintiffs. If the defendant, being an upper riparian proprietor, and as such entitled to the ordinary use of the water, including the right to apply it in a reasonable manner to domestic uses, and even to purposes of trade and manufacture, is using the water of the stream in an unreasonable manner, and has defiled the same to such an extent as to constitute an actual invasion of the rights of the plaintiffs, then both are clearly entitled to redress by action at law, and, in case the nuisance be continued, to summary relief by injunction. Baltimore v. Warren Mfg. Co. supra, and cases cited. Injunction is undoubtedly a proper remedy to prevent the fouling of the water of a running stream by its improper and unreasonable use when prejudicial to the rights of others interested in having the water descend to them in its ordinary natural state of purity. Goldsmid v. Tunbridge Wells Improv. Comrs. L. R. 1 Ch. 349, and cases, supra. But have the plaintiffs made out any such case? They must not only establish that they have a right to be protected, but they must, in addition, show by satisfactory proof that the right has actually been infringed in some material way, or that the defendant is about to commit some act which will tend so far to impair the right as that the damage will be irreparable. "It is a well-settled rule of equity procedure that an injunction to restrain a nuisance will issue only in cases where the fact of nuisance is made out upon determinate and satisfactory evidence. If the evidence be conflicting, and the injury be doubtful, that will constitute a ground for withholding the injunction. . . . Where the interposition by injunction is sought to restrain that which it is apprehended will create a nuisance, the proofs must show that the apprehension of material and irreparable injury is well grounded upon a state of facts which show the danger to be real and immediate." Newark Aqueduct Board v. Passaic, 45 N. J. Eq. 393, 18 Atl. 106; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 924a; Brookline v. Mackintosh, 133 Mass. 215; Atty. Gen. ex rel. Holtz v. Heishon, 18 N. J. Eq. 410; 1 High, Inj. 4th ed. §§ 774, 811; Crossley v. Lightowler, L. R. 2 Ch. 483.

In this case the plaintiffs have not shown by any satisfactory proof, such as the law requires, that the river at the intake of the water company has been polluted. It was an easy matter for the plaintiffs to have had the water analyzed at the place where it is drawn into the mains through which it is conveyed to the city, and it appears by the evidence in the case that a chemical and bacteriological analysis could have been made which would have ascertained, with a reasonable degree of certainty at least, whether the water had been corrupted at the intake by the sewage and waste material deposited in the stream at defendant's mill. There is proof on the part of the defendant that there are so many obstructions in the way of the passage of deleterious matter from the site of the mill to the intake and so many natural means presented for the renewal and purification of the stream by the influx of great quantities of fresh and pure water from its tributaries and by sedimentation, as to make it improbable, if not impossible, that any deadly germs could "survive the journey" for so many miles between the two points on the river. The only evidence offered in answer to the proof introduced by the defendant, and the inference to be fairly drawn from the failure to make a proper analysis to establish the contention which seems susceptible of demonstration in that way, are the opinions of several physicians and one or two laymen, to the effect that the pollution at the outlet of the defendant's sewer will injuriously affect the water at the intake and endanger the health of the citizens of Durham who use the water taken from the river. Opinions of this kind are of the highest value under certain circumstances, but the law requires something more tangible and definite as a basis for seriously interfering with important industrial enterprises. In a case somewhat similar to this, in which just such proof was relied on, the court said: "Speaking with all possible respect to the scientific gentlemen who have given their evidence, . . . I think that in cases of this nature much more weight is due to the facts which are proved than to conclusions drawn from scientific investigations. The conclusions to be drawn from scientific investigations are, no doubt, in such cases of great value in aid or in explanation and qualification of the facts which are proved, but in my judgment it is upon the facts which are proved, and not upon such conclusions, [we] . . . ought in these cases mainly to rely in my view, . . . therefore, the scientific evidence ought to be considered as secondary only to the evidence as to the facts." Goldsmid v. Tunbridge Wells Improv. Comrs. supra. That case was reviewed at length and approved in Newark Aqueduct Board v. Passaic, supra, where a most learned discussion of the subject will be found, and the same may be said of Baltimore v. Warren Mfg. Co. 59 Md. 96, where Judge Alvey, who delivered the opinion of the court, states with his usual clearness and force the true principles and grounds upon which the courts proceed in such cases as the one we have under consideration. See also Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U. S. 208, 45 L. ed. 497, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. -331; Atty. Gen. v.

Basingstoke, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 726. The injury here is entirely prospective, and it is only possible to form an opinion upon evidence which does not enable us to do more than conjecture whether the apprehension of the plaintiffs is well grounded and free from reasonable doubt. So far as the present state of the proof goes, the jurisdiction of a court of equity is invoked to restrain that which is alleged may, or at the most will, create a nuisance, and not that which, in fact, does create a nuisance. Missouri v. Illinois, supra; Dorsey v. Allen, 85 N. C. 358, 39 Am. Rep. 704. But if the court should interfere by injunction where it is merely probable that a nuisance will result from the acts of the defendant, we do not think the plaintiffs have sufficiently brought their case within the operation of this rule. Ellison v. Washington, 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 57, 75 Am. Dec. 430; Barnes v. Calhoun, 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 199; Simpson v. Justice, 43 N. C. (8 Ired. Eq.) 115; Vickers v. Durham, 132 N. C. 880, 44 S. E. 685; Dorsey v. Allen, supra; Stockton v. Central R. Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 80, 17 L.R.A. 97, 24 Atl. 964.

Proof easily accessible to the plaintiffs, and which would have established the fact of nuisance beyond any doubt, was not produced; but the court is urged to resort to evidence of a secondary and less satisfactory nature upon which to determine the important rights of the parties. Under the facts and circumstances as disclosed by the record, we would have been obliged to reverse the ruling of the court below and leave the plaintiffs to the necessity of making good their allegation of nuisance at the hearing, in order to entitle themselves to injunctive relief; and this course would be pursued if we were confined in our investigation of this case to the mere fact of nuisance. But we are not so restricted, as the legislature has spoken upon the subject of this controversy, and it is our duty to give heed to what it has said. Its declared will is the law, and must be enforced, if it has been sufficiently expressed or by fair construction it can be ascertained. The legislature, by chapter 670, p. 857, Laws 1899, undertook to protect public water supplies from contamination by providing for a thorough system of inspection and the adoption of such sanitary measures as would be likely to contribute to that end. This law contained no provision as to the discharge of sewage into any streams of the state from which a public water supply is taken, but simply related to the subjects of inspection and sanitation. Believing that such a system was not adequate to the full protection of the people of this state from contamination of the water used for drinking and other domestic purposes, the legislature passed another act, it being chapter 159, p. 182, Laws 1903, entitled, as the former act, "An Act to Protect Water Supplies." This act contained all of the features of the act of 1899, and provided generally, in § 1, that water companies should take reasonable precautions to insure the purity of water supplied to the public. It is provided in § 2, that companies which are supplied from lakes, ponds, or small streams not more than 15 miles in length shall at their own expense have a sanitary inspection of their entire watershed not less than once in every three calendar months, and special inspections when circumstances seem to require them. It then directs how the inspection shall be made, namely, by a particular examination of the premises of every inhabitant of the watershed and a search in passing from house to house for dead bodies of animals or the accumulation of filth, excepting uninhabited fields and wooded tracts which are free from suspicion. Where the supply of water is drawn from rivers or large creeks having a minimum daily flow of 10,000,000 gallons, the provisions of § 2 shall apply only to the 15 miles of watershed draining into the said river or creek next above the intake of the water company. Provision is then made for an inspection by every city or town having a public water supply of its entire watershed, and it is declared to be a misdemeanor to deposit dead animals or human excreta on the watershed of any water supply, or to defile, corrupt, or pollute any well, spring, drain, branch, brook, creek, or other source of a public water supply. Then follows § 13 of the act, which is as follows: "No person or municipality shall flow or discharge sewage into any drain, brook, creek, or river from which a public drinking-water supply is taken, unless the same shall have been passed through some well-known system of sewage purification approved by the state board of health; and the continual flow and discharge of such sewage may be enjoined upon application of any person." This act has been inserted in the Revisal as chapter 76, and is not materially different, as there found, from what it was in the original form. The provision in regard to the flowing or discharging of sewage into a stream from which a public water supply is taken seems to be very explicit and susceptible of but one construction.

The defendant contends: (1) That § 13, chap. 159, p. 185, of the Acts of 1903, being § 3051 of the Revisal of 1905, applies only to sewers maintained within the distance of 15 miles above the intake, which is the watershed, as defined in the 2d and 3d sections of chapter 159, p. 183, of the act, and §§ 3045 and 3046 of the Revisal of 1905. (2) That, if the provision of § 13 is construed to apply to this defendant whose mill is situated 17 miles above the intake of the Durham Water Company, then it is unconstitutional and void as being, in effect, a taking of the defendant's property without condemnation and without compensation; in other words, it is confiscation. We cannot assent to either of these propositions. If we could think that the acts of the defendant are not within the inhibition of that law, or that its property is about to be unlawfully taken or interfered with, we would not hesitate to interpose and protect it against such contemplated action. But the meaning of the legislature is so clear to us and its power thus to legislate is so well established that we could not so act without plainly disregarding the mandate of the law-making body given in the rightful exercise of its constitutional power.

As to the defendant's first contention, it is clear that by the 2d and 3d sections of the act the legislature intended to establish a watershed solely for the purpose of inspection. This is to be deduced from the very language in those sections; and, further, it appears from the manner in which the inspection is required to be made that sewage was not the source of infection or pollution intended to be guarded against by the inspection of the watershed. It is plainly excluded by the very terms of those two sections. At least it so appears to us. But if there could be any doubt as to the true meaning of that part of the act, we think that § 13 (Revisal 1905, § 3051), which is quoted above, is so broadly worded as to absolutely preclude the construction that the legislature intended to limit the acts therein prohibited to be done to the watershed of 15 miles above the intake. We can give to that section no other meaning, unless we read into it something that is not there and clearly not intended to be there. The act forbidden is "the flow or discharge of sewage into any river from which a public drinking supply is taken," unless purified as therein provided. It does not confine its operation to the watershed, but extends to any stream from which water is taken to be supplied to the public for drinking purposes. To limit its scope as suggested would be to defeat the clearly expressed intent of the legislature, and this we are not permitted to do. We entertain no doubt as to what was intended, and we are constrained to hold that the admitted acts of the defendant are within the prohibition of the statute.

The second position is equally untenable. It will be observed by reading the act that it is not required that the sewage discharged into the stream should injuriously affect the water at the intake; it is quite sufficient if it pollutes the river at the sewer's outlet. The legislature has decided that it is desirable to preserve our natural streams in at least their present state of purity, and, where they have been polluted, to remove the cause as speedily and effectually as possible. It has therefore said that no person shall deteriorate the water at all by sending sewage into a natural stream, until it has been purified and made wholesome, or until all the noxious matter in it has been eliminated. And this means, of course, that the water shall not be poisoned by sewage at the outfall. We must assume that the defilement of the water is an injury which is forbidden by the legislature for perfectly good and sufficient reasons. It is not for us to question the policy or expediency of such an enactment. In this respect the legislature has a large discretion, to be exercised in such way as will, in its judgment, promote the interests and advance the welfare of the people, and it has this discretion to such an extent as to be virtually a law unto itself so far as the manner of its exercise is concerned. Such legislation is not intended merely to abate an existing nuisance, but to prevent that being done which is a menace to the public health, and which it is supposed may become a deadly peril and a public nuisance because fatal in its consequences. It is not, therefore, a void law because it is founded upon mere apprehension of evil, but is a precautionary measure which is clearly within the police power of the state and to be adopted when deemed necessary to secure the public health. We think the general principles we have thus stated will be found clearly stated by Sir George Jessel, for the court, and supported by cogent reasoning, in Atty. Gen. v. Cockermouth Local Board, L. R. 18 Eq. 172. That case and this one are not unlike in the facts to which the principle was applied.

But a more elaborate treatment of the doctrine in its relation to the police power as its basis will be found in State v. Wheeler, 44 N. J. L. 88. The facts in that case were also like those we now have before us in this record. The language of Judge Magie, speaking for the court, would seem to have been uttered with reference to the facts we have here, did we not know that it was actually used in another case. Its appositeness must be our apology for quoting copiously from that case. The court says: "The whole act plainly shows a design to protect from pollution the waters of creeks, etc., used as the feeders for reservoirs for public use, without any reference to whether such pollution, in fact, appresiably affects the waters when arrived at the reservoir. Nor does such a construction render this act objectionable. The design of the act is not to take property for public use, nor does it do so within the meaning of the Constitution. It is intended to restrain and regulate the use of private property so as to protect the common right of all the citizens of the state. Such acts are plainly within the police power of the legislature, which power is the mere application to the whole community of the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lēdas. Nor does such a restraint, although it may interfere with the profitable use of property by its owner, make it an appropriation to a public use so as to entitle him to compensation. . . . Of the right of the legislature thus to restrain the use of private property in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state no question ever was, or upon acknowledged general principles ever can be, made, so far as natural persons are concerned.' Redfield, Ch. J., in Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 149, 62 Am. Dec. 625. The same view has been always held in this state, and notably in the case of State ex rel. Sandford v. Court of Common Pleas, 36 N. J. L. 72, 13 Am. Rep. 422. It was also there held that the extent to which such interference with the injurious use of property may be carried is a matter exclusively for the judgment of the legislature, when not controlled by fundamental law. Nor is there anything to render such legislation objectionable because in some instances it may restrain the profitable use of private property, when such use, in fact, does not directly injure the public in comfort or health. For to limit such legislation to cases where actual injury has occurred would be to deprive it of its most effective force. Its design is preventive, and to be effective it must be able to restrain acts which tend to produce public injury. Many instances of such an exercise of this power can be found. The state regulates the use of property in intoxicating liquors by restraining their sale, not on the ground that each particular sale does injury, for then the sale would be prohibited, but for the reason that their unrestricted sale tends to injure the public morals and comfort. The state is not bound to wait until contagion is communicated from a hospital established in the heart of a city. It may prohibit the establishment of such a hospital there, because it is likely to spread contagion. So the keeping of dangerous explosives and inflammable substances, and the erection of buildings of combustible materials within the limits of a dense population, may be prohibited, because of the probability or possibility of public injury. Such instances might be indefinitely multiplied, but these are sufficient to illustrate this case. The object of this legislation is to protect the public comfort and health. For that purpose the legislature may restrain any use of private property which tends to the injury of those public interests. That the pollution of the sources of the public water supply does so tend, no one will deny."

We might well content ourselves with stopping here and resting our judgment upon the unanswerable argument there presented, and we would do so but for the great importance of the question and the far-reaching consequences of our decision. The police power by virtue of which this legislation is vindicated and justified is no new or unusual exercise of the sovereign will. It has its origin in the most ancient maxims of jurisprudence. All property was originally acquired subject to regulation in its use by those cardinal principles embodied in the maxim, "The safety of the people is the supreme law," and that other maxim, "So use your own as not to injure another." This was the original condition imposed upon the right of property in things,—that it should be enjoyed subject to reasonable regulations, when considered necessary to promote the general good of society. A good statement of the nature and extent of this police power is to be found in Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 140, 62 Am. Dec. 625, where Redfield, Ch. J., says: "This police power of the state extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the state. According to the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lēdas, which being of universal application, it must, of course, be within the range of legislative action to define the mode and manner in which everyone may so use his own as not to injure others. . . . There is also the general police power of the state, by which persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state, of the perfect right, in the legislature, to do which no question ever was, or, upon acknowledged general principles, ever can be, made, so far as natural persons are concerned. And it is certainly calculated to excite surprise and alarm, that the right to do the same in regard to railways should be made a serious question. This objection is made generally upon two grounds: (1) That it subjects corporations to virtual destruction by the legislature; and (2) that it is an attempt to control the obligation of one person to another, in matters of merely private concern. The first point has already been somewhat labored. It is admitted that the essential franchise of a private corporation is recognized by the best authority as private property, and cannot be taken without compensation, even for public use." He then proceeds to demonstrate conclusively that the police power resides primarily and ultimately in the legislature, and that private interests of every kind fall legitimately within the range of legislative control, both in regard to natural and artificial persons. "It seems incredible," he says, "how any doubt should have arisen upon the point now before the court. And it would seem it could not, except from some undefined apprehension, which seems to have prevailed to a considerable extent, that a corporation did possess some more exclusive powers and privileges upon the subject of its business, than a natural person in the same business, with equal power to pursue and to accomplish it, which, I trust, has been sufficiently denied." The general conclusion reached is that there can be no manner of doubt that the legislature may, if the public good is deemed to demand it,—of which it is the judge, its judgment in all doubtful cases being final,—require property to be used by persons, as well as their business to be conducted, so as to prevent harm or injury to the public.

The same principle is strongly stated in State ex rel. Sanford v. Court of Common Pleas, 36 N. J. L. 72, 13 Am. Rep. 422: "While alcoholic stimulants are recognized as property, and are entitled to the protection of the law, ownership in them is subject to such restraints as are demanded by the highest considerations of public expediency. Such enactments are regarded as police regulations, established for the prevention of pauperism and crime, for the abatement of nuisances, and the promotion of public health and safety. They or a just restraint of an injurious use of property, which the legislature has authority to impose, and the extent to which such interference may be carried must rest exclusively in legislative wisdom, where it is not controlled by fundamental law. It is a settled principle, essential to the right of self-preservation in every organized community, that however absolute may be the owner's title to his property, he holds it under the implied condition 'that its use shall not work injury to the equal enjoyment and safety of others, who have an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor be injurious to the community.' Rights of property are subject to such limitations as are demanded by the common welfare of society, and it is within the range and scope of legislative action to declare what general regulations shall be deemed expedient. If, therefore, the legislature shall consider the retail of ardent spirits injurious to citizens, or productive of idleness and vice, it may provide for its total suppression. Such inhibition is justified only as a police regulation, and its legality has been recognized in well-considered cases. It is neither in conflict with the power of Congress over subjects within its exclusive jurisdiction, nor with any provisions of our state Constitution, nor with general fundamental principles. Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, p. 583, and cases there referred to; Thurlow v. Massachusetts, 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256. It is not necessary to amplify discussion on this point, or to criticize the cases in detail. The view here taken underlies the whole subject of police regulations, and cannot logically be narrowed in its application." In Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, Chief Justice Shaw, referring to the police power, says: "This is very different from the right of eminent domain, the right of a government to take and appropriate private property to public use, whenever the public exigency requires it; which can be done only on condition of providing a reasonable compensation therefor. The power we allude to is rather the police power, the power vested in the legislature by the Constitution, to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes, and ordinances, either with penalties or without, not repugnant to the Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the commonwealth, and of the subjects of the same. It is much easier to perceive and realize the existence and sources of this power than to mark its boundaries or prescribe limits to its exercise. There are many cases in which such a power is exercised by all well-ordered governments, and where its fitness is so obvious that all well-regulated minds will regard it as reasonable." He then cites numerous instances in which the power can be rightfully exercised, and among them the use of property near inhabited villages in such a way as to produce dangerous exhalations, injurious to health and dangerous to life, and proceeds: "Nor does the prohibition of such noxious use of property—a prohibition imposed because such use would be injurious to the public, although it may diminish the profits of the owner—make it an appropriation to a public use, so as to entitle the owner to compensation. . . . He [the owner] is restrained, not because the public have occasion to make the like use, or to make any use of the property, or to take any benefit or profit to themselves from it, but because it would be a noxious use, contrary to the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. It is not an appropriation of the property to a public use, but the restraint of an injurious private use by the owner, and is therefore not within the principle of property taken under the right of eminent domain." A case also directly in point is State v. Streeper, 5 N. J. L. J. 116.

The very contention made in this case, that the property of the defendant is taken unlawfully and without due process of law, and that it is denied the equal protection of the laws, thereby violating the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, was fully met and answered in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, a leading and authoritative decision upon this question. The court, by Harlan, J., there says: "Undoubtedly the state, when providing by legislation for the protection of the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, is subject to the paramount authority of the Constitution of the United States, and may not violate rights secured or guaranteed by that instrument, or interfere with the execution of the powers confided to the general government. But neither the [14th] Amendment, broad and comprehensive as it is, nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the state, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the state, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity." He then asks the question, Who shall determine whether the particular use of property is injurious to the public? and gives this answer: "Power to determine such questions, so as to bind all, must exist somewhere, else society will be at the mercy of the few. . . . Under our system, that power is lodged with the legislative branch of the government. It belongs to that department to exert what are known as the police powers of the state, and to determine, primarily, what measures are appropriate or needful for the protection of the public morals, the public health, or the public safety." Summing up and stating the result of all the decisions of that court, it is further said: "The principle that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law was embodied, in substance, in the Constitutions of nearly all, if not all, of the states at the time of the adoption of the 14th Amendment; and it has never been regarded as incompatible with the principle, equally vital, because essential to the peace and safety of society, that all property in this country is held under the implied obligation that the owner's use of it shall not be injurious to the community." This court "has, nevertheless, with marked distinction and uniformity, recognized the necessity, growing out of the fundamental conditions of civil society, of upholding state police regulations which were enacted in good faith, and had appropriate and direct connection with that protection to life, health, and property which each state owes to her citizens. . . . A prohibition simply upon the use of property for purposes that are declared, by valid legislation, to be injurious to the health, morals, or safety of the community, cannot, in any just sense, be deemed a taking or an appropriation of property for the public benefit. Such legislation does not disturb the owner in the control or use of his property for lawful purposes, nor restrict his right to dispose of it, but is only a declaration by the state that its use by anyone, for certain forbidden purposes, is prejudicial to the public interests."

It was said in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 124, 24 L. ed. 83, that, while power does not exist with the whole people to control rights that are purely and exclusively private, government may require "each citizen to so conduct himself, and so use his own property, as not unnecessarily to injure another. This is the very essence of government, and has found expression in the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. From this source come the police powers, which, as was said by Chief Justice Taney in the License Cases, 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256, are nothing more or less than the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty; . . . that is to say, the power to govern men and things." And again, at page 124, 24 L. ed. at page 83: "A body politic . . . is a social compact by which the whole people covenants with each citizen, and each citizen with the whole people, that all shall be governed by certain laws for the common good." The same court said, in Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 32, 24 L. ed. 992: "If the public safety or the public morals require the discontinuance of any manufacture or traffic, the hand of the legislature cannot be stayed from providing for its discontinuance by any incidental inconvenience which individuals or corporations may suffer. All rights are held subject to the police power of the state." But the case of Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 24 L. ed. 1036, seems to be directly in point. It involved the validity of an ordinance against conducting an unwholesome business within the corporate limits of the village of Hyde Park, at the plaintiff, who at great expense had erected fertilizer works in the county and transported animal matter through the village, sought to enjoin the enforcement of the ordinance, which it claimed would utterly ruin its business. The same contention was made there as here. The court, in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. at page 667, 31 L. ed. at page 212, and 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. at page 300, referring to that case and answering the contention, said: "The enforcement of the ordinance in question operated to destroy the business of the company, and seriously to impair the value of its property. As, however, its business had become a nuisance to the community in which it was conducted, producing discomfort, and often sickness, among large masses of people, the court maintained the authority of the village, acting under legislative sanction, to protect the public health against such nuisance. It [the court] said: 'We cannot doubt that the police power of the state was applicable and adequate to give an effectual remedy. That power belonged to the states when the Federal Constitution was adopted. They did not surrender it, and they all have it now. It extends to the entire property and business within their local jurisdiction. Both are subject to it in all proper cases. It rests upon the fundamental principle that every one shall so use his own as not to wrong and injure another. To regulate and abate nuisances is one of its ordinary functions.'"

Cases might be cited almost without number to sustain the general proposition now being considered. We will refer to several, decided in the courts of other states, which have a direct bearing upon the question. State v. Griffin, 69 N. H. 1, 41 L.R.A. 177, 76 Am. St. Rep. 139, 39 Atl. 260; Durango v. Chapman, 27 Colo. 169, 60 Pac. 635; Com. ex rel. McCormick v. Russell, 172 Pa. 506, 33 Atl. 709; Haskell v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 208. This court has said, in Brown v. Keener, 74 N. C. 714: "It is too late to question that the public power of a state (which is a part of its general legislative power) extends to the providing for every object which may be reasonably considered necessary for the public safety, health, good order, or prosperity, and which is not forbidden by some restriction in the state or Federal Constitution, or by some recognized principle of right and justice found in the common law. It is unnecessary to consider at present the limits of this extensive power, since it clearly includes the right to provide for and compel the clearing out not only of such water courses as are naturally navigable, but of all such water courses and drains as are not and never were navigable, but which are necessary for carrying off the surplus rain water, thereby promoting the public health, and enabling a considerable portion of territory otherwise uninhabitable to be brought into cultivation. Norfleet v. Cromwell, 70 N. C. 634, 16 Am. Rep. 787; People ex rel. Griffin v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 440, 55 Am. Dec. 266; Coster v. Tide Water Co. 18 N. J. Eq. 54; State v. Blake, 36 N. J. L. 442; Reeves v. Wood County, 8 Ohio St. 343; Cooley, Const. Lim. chap. 16; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 506." Other cases which have been decided by this court involving in one form or another questions arising out of the exercise of the police power are State v. Muse, 20 N. C. 463 (4 Dev. & B. L. 319); Intendant v. Sorrell, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 49; Pool v. Trexler, 76 N. C. 297; Norfleet v. Cromwell, supra; State v. Joyner, 81 N. C. 534; Winslow v. Winslow, 95 N. C. 24; State v. Yopp, 97 N. C. 477, 2 Am. St. Rep. 305, 2 S. E. 458; State v. Pendergrass, 106 N. C. 664, 10 S. E. 1002; State v. Stovall, 103 N. C. 416, 8 S. E. 900; State v. Hay, 126 N. C. 999, 49 L.R.A. 588, 78 Am. St. Rep. 691, 35 S. E. 459; Hutchins v. Durham, 137 N. C. 68, 49 S. E. 46; State v. McGinnis, 138 N. C. 724, 51 S. E. 50.

It is, of course, no defense that pure and wholesome water can be obtained from other sources than the Eno river. 2 Farnham, Waters, § 515. The fact is that the water supply of Durham is drawn from that stream, and that is what protects it, under the act, from being fouled by sewage. The preservation of the public health was the chief concern of the legislature, and the purpose of the act was to remove any possible danger which should menace it. Whether the plaintiffs would have any standing in court without the aid of the statute and if left to depend upon its right to use the water of Eno river under its contract with the water company, if it has one, is a question not presented for consideration, and upon it we express no opinion. Our decision must rest solely on the provisions of the statute, which is susceptible of but one meaning, and which declares explicitly that streams used as is the Eno river shall not be polluted, as disease may be communicated to the inhabitants of towns and cities by the use of the water. The fact that the public supply is taken from the stream is sufficient to bring it within the protection of the act, for we must construe the law as it is written and according to its true intent, looking at the evil sought to be remedied and giving it such effect as will not in the least disappoint the will of the people as expressed therein. If any hardship results, it is not from the construction of the law, but from the law itself and the declared policy of the state that the public health must be safeguarded. The welfare of the public is considered in law superior to the interests of individuals, and, when there is a conflict between them, the latter must give way. Necessitas publica major est quam privata. As the law is plainly written, so must we decide. The remedy of those who may suffer is by appeal to the lawmaking body, who alone can abate the rigor of its enactment.

The judgment must be affirmed, but the court below may so draw its order as to give the defendant a reasonable opportunity to comply with the statute. The injunction should operate so as to produce the least possible injury to the defendant's property and business consistent with the maintenance of the rights and interests of the public.

Affirmed.

WILLIE ROLIN, by Next Friend, Appt.,
v.
R. J. REYNOLDS TOBACCO COMPANY.

(141 N. C. 300, 53 S. E. 891.)

Child—unlawful employment—negligence.

1. The employment of a child in a factory in violation of the provisions of the statute is evidence of negligence in an action by the child to recover for personal injuries inflicted by a machine in the factory.

Case Note.—Employment of child in violation of statute as negligence which will sustain an action by the child for personal injuries:—The violation of a statute forbidding the employment of children under a certain age, or their employment at certain kinds of work or without complying with certain conditions, is held by the weight of authority to be negligence as matter of law, in an action by the child for injuries received during the course of the employment. American Car & Foundry Co. v. Armentraut, 214 Ill. 509, 73 N. E. 766, Affirming 116 Ill. App. 121; Morris v. Stanfield, 81 Ill. App. 284; Nickey v. Steuder, 164 Ind. 189, 73 N. E. 117; Brower v. Locke, 31 Ind. App. 353, 67 N. E. 1015; Woolf v. Nauman Co. 128 Iowa, 261, 103 N. W. 785; Queen v. Dayton Coal & I. Co. 95 Tenn. 458, 30 L.R.A. 82, 49 Am. St. Rep. 935, 32 S. W. 460; *Sterling v. In Perry v. Tozer, 90 Minn. 431, 101 Am. St. Rep. 416, 97 N. W. 137, however, it was held that the employment in a sawmill of a boy under the age of sixteen without procuring from the school authorities a certificate permitting his employment, as required by statute, together with an injury occurring while he was engaged in his work about certain machinery because of the failure to guard the machine, made out a prima facie 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Negligence — injury to child — proximate cause.

2. The jury may find that the employment, contrary to statute, of a child in a factory, was the proximate cause of his injury by the starting of the machine by another child after he had put his hand into it to remove an article thrown into it by such other child.

Child—presumption of negligence.

3. A child under twelve years of age is presumed to be incapable of so understanding and appreciating danger from attempting to remove an article from a machine at rest as to make him guilty of contributory negligence and bar his recovery in case the machine is started to his injury.

Same—contributory negligence—question for jury.

4. Whether or not a child is guilty of contributory negligence in any given case is a question for the jury in view of his age, intelligence, knowledge of the surroundings, and capacity to know and appreciate the danger.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Forsyth County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

case of negligence against the employer, in an action by the boy for injuries thus received; so that if plaintiff had rested upon this proof, and no evidence had been introduced to contradict it, he would have been entitled to recover, though this prima facie showing might be rebutted by evidence that the machine which caused plaintiff's injury was properly guarded, or that plaintiff himself contributed to the accident. The court said that the violation of the statute, followed by injury from causes necessarily incident to the employment and business of the employer, shifted the burden of proof which would otherwise rest upon the plaintiff. It was contended here that it was the operation of the machinery, and at most the improper protection of the same, that was the proximate cause of the injury, and not the violation of the statute; but the court said that authorities of the highest respectability hold that the violation of a statute prohibiting the employment of a child in a hazardous occupation, where such employment is prohibited by law, establishes a right to recover for negligence; that in such case liability is to be presumed from the employment in disobedience of law; also that even the imposition of a penalty by the statute did not oust the remedy by suit for negligence.

And in Breckenridge v. Reagan, 22 Ohio C. C. 71, the employment of a child in violation of a statute forbidding the employ-

Statement by Connor, J.:

Action for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while in defendant's employment. Plaintiff testified: "I commenced work for the defendant about a year ago, May, 1904. I went in there one Monday morning. Mr. Nichols, boss man in the room, spoke to me and asked me if I wanted to weigh fillers. I told him, 'Yes.' He took me over and put me to weighing. Then he put me to cutting lumps on a table. They were making 3-inch work. I worked at that place three days on one fortnight, and on the second fortnight six days. After cutting lumps I then was a sweeper on the floor. I cleaned up about machines and around the floor. That evening at 4 o'clock we got out of the factory. The weigh boy went down the house to wash his hands. The man that run that machine went down the house to clean up another machine. I was cleaning up that one I worked at. The weigh boy ran up and threw a piece of cut tobacco in the machine. I reached my hand in there to take it out. He pulled the lever and run, and the machine caught my hand and tore it off. I don't know the fellow who took me out of the machine. Mr. Nichols took me up in the house above and he said, 'Did you not tell me you were twelve years old?' I said 'No.' I was eleven years old in June, 1903. When cutting off lumps I was 12 inches away from the machine. No one explained to me the dangerous character of the machine, nor told me anything about it. I was born June 4, 1892. I would ment of any child under the age of sixteen by any firm or corporation at employment whereby its life or limb is endangered or its health likely to be injured is held to be "some evidence" of negligence, in an action by the child for injuries received while thus employed.

So, in Marino v. Lehmaier, 173 N. Y. 530, 61 L.R.A. 811, 66 N. E. 572, Affirming 62 App. Div. 43, 70 N. Y. Supp. 790, where it was held that the violation of a statute forbidding the employment in factories of children of a certain age may be found to be negligence which will support a civil action for injuries resulting therefrom, although its violation is punishable as a misdemeanor, Haight, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said that at least a question of fact was presented for the determination of the jury as to the defendant's negligence, while Parker, Ch. J., in concurring, said that, although the violation of the statute would not, as matter of law, charge the offender in damages for all injuries sustained, yet such violation, in case of injuries which could not have happened but for its violation, might constitute evidence of negligence to be considered by the triers of fact; that, while the offense against the state was punishable by it as a misdemeanor, the violation of the statute was, as against the child, whom the state deems incompetent to contract for such forbidden service, a "wrongful and negligent act," which of itself furnished "some evidence" of negligence in cases where the accident could not have happened but for the employment. O'Brien, J., dissented in this case, saying he did not think the mere employment of the child, although in violation of the labor law, was any proof of actionable negligence, and that it would not do to say there was a question of fact as to the negligence, for there was none; that there was no dispute about the violation of the statute, and its violation proved negligence or it did not; that, if it did, then the plaintiff was entitled to recover, as matter of law, and there was nothing for the jury to do except to assess the damages; that, if it did not prove negligence, then the action failed.

The language of Parker and Haight, JJ., in this case is also criticized in Lee v. Sterling Silk Mfg. Co. 47 Misc. 182, 93 N. Y. Supp. 560, where it was held that the employment of a child in violation of the statute forbidding any child under the age of fourteen to be employed in any factory, was negligence per se in case of injury to the child. The court said that violation of the statute was either a breach of duty by employer to employee, or an act of negligence, as some would have it phrased, which makes the employer liable, or else it is not; that there can be no middle ground; that it cannot be left to the jury to find in one case that it does make him liable, and in the next that it does not; that the question is not one of fact, but of law. And, in referring to the language of Haight, J., in the Marino Case, to the effect that the violation of the statute raised at least a question of fact for the determination of the jury, and to the language of Parker, Ch. J., that the violation of the statute as against the child was a wrongful and negligent act which by itself furnished some evidence of negligence, said: "The dubious tone of these learned opinions leaves trial judges in doubt as to what to do. The violation of the statute is 'some' evidence of negligence, or 'at least' presents a question of fact, say these opinions; but a trial judge, in charging a jury, cannot be dubious, or blow both hot and cold. He has to state the law explicitly. Where this phrase of 'some evidence' was first used on this head I do not know. . . . The truth is (as is apparent to our educated profession) that the violation of a duty created by a city ordinance or any other statute is no different to a violation of a duty created by a rule of the common law. Just the same in each case, if it injures another, the wrongdoer is liable to him as a matter of law. There is no distinction whatever. . . . Confused verbiage is not suffered in any science to obscure plain principles. Every piece of evidence is 'some evidence.' An ordinance is not have been hurt if the boy had not pulled the lever. The machine was set, and you had to pull the lever that made it work and set it. At time I was hurt I worked by the side of John Dillon all that day. Table and truck between me and the machine. The lever is in front of the machine. I did not get a lump and try to press it in the machine. He (Dillon) had pressed a lump that day for me. It was not after quitting time when I got hurt. If it was, all hands had not gotten out of the factory. No one told me to clean up the machine. I saw others cleaning up the machine, and I did so. No one ever asked me to clean up the machine, or do anything about it. It was part of my duty to clean up around the machine. Will Hairston is the name of the boy that pulled the lever of the machine on me. He is working down there in the factory now. There was a belt attached to the machine running at the time. No one told me to clean up around the machines. Other boys were at work cleaning up."

There was other evidence in regard to plaintiff's age, extent of injury, etc. At the conclusion of the evidence defendant demurred and moved for judgment as of nonsuit. Motion allowed. Plaintiff excepted. Judgment. Appeal.

'some evidence' in the general mass. But if A injure B by the violation of a duty to B imposed by the ordinance, he is liable as matter of law; otherwise the ordinance has no weight or force in the case, and would only serve to mislead a jury the same as an inapplicable statute or common-law rule. To have instructed the jury in the present case that the violation of the statute was 'some evidence' of the defendant's violation of the duty he owed to the plaintiff under the statute, or of his negligence, if you prefer; and that it was for them to say whether it was enough to establish the fact of liability,—would have been quite absurd, it seems to me, and only a puzzle to the jury. Is it possible that it may be left to a jury to say it is enough in one case and not enough in the next case? It makes the defendant liable in every case or else in none."

But in White v. Witteman Lithographic Co. 58 Hun, 381, 12 N. Y. Supp. 188, it is again held that the mere hiring of a child under the age of thirteen, in violation of statute, is not sufficient to establish negligence; that the violation of the statute is evidence only upon the question of negligence, and that there must be other evidence of negligence to establish it. The case was affirmed in 131 N. Y. 631, 30 N. E. 236, but this point seems not to have been raised upon appeal.

Even though the violation of the statute is negligence, yet, in order to entitle the injured child to recover, it must, of course, be shown that the wrongful employment was the proximate cause of the injury. As said in Queen v. Dayton Coal & I. Co. 95 Tenn. 464, 30 L.R.A. 83, 49 Am. St. Rep. 935, 32 S. W. 460, where the wrongful employment was held to be negligence per se: "Of course, we do not hold that, if the boy had died of organic disease of the heart, or from a stroke of paralysis, or from some cause wholly disconnected with his employment, the company would have been liable in damages simply on account of the employment in violation of the statute. But we do hold that the breach of the statute is actionable negligence whenever it is shown that the injuries were sustained in consequence of the employment.

So, in Nickey v. Steuder, 164 Ind. 189, 73 N. E. 117, where the wrongful employment was also held to be negligence per se, recovery was denied on the ground that the negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury, which resulted from the act of a third person, who had come to the premises to obtain wood, in carelessly throwing a stick of wood against the child.

Some of the cases, however, are very liberal to the child in determining what may be deemed the proximate result of the violation of the statute, and seem to regard the mere fact of the wrongful employment sufficient to render the employer liable for almost any injury which might happen to the child while he is on the employer's premises.

Thus, in Marquette Third Vein Coal Co. v. Dielie, 110 Ill. App. 684, Affirmed in 208 Ill. 116, 70 N. E. 17, it was held that the employment of a boy in a mine in violation of a statute providing that no boy under the age of fourteen shall be permitted to work in or about any mine, and that before any boy can be permitted to work in any mine he must produce to the mine manager or operator an affidavit that he is fourteen years of age, renders the mine owner liable for any injury which may occur to the child in the mine or by the operation of the mine, even if the injury occurs while the child is absent from his post of duty, or while violating orders.

Again, in Iron & Wire Co. v. Green, 108 Tenn. 164, 65 S. W. 399, it was held that, under a statute forbidding the employment of any child less than twelve years of age in any workshop, mill, factory, or mine, one employing a child in violation of the statute was liable for every injury resulting from such employment; and that, even if the injury happened, as contended, because of the child's action in leaving the building where he was employed and going into the yard and playing with some panels of iron fence on the premises, which fell upon him, nevertheless the master was liable, as the causal Defendant was negligent in that it employed the plaintiff to work in a dangerous place without giving him any instructions, or explaining to him the dangerous character of the machines about which he was to work.

Thomp. Neg. 978; Fitzgerald v. Alma

Furniture Co. supra; Bailey, Personal Injuries Relating to Master & Servant, § 2786. Messrs. Manly & Hendren for appellee.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff bases his right to recover on the facts admitted by the demurrer upon two propositions: That his employment by the defendant, he being under twelve years of age, was in violation of the provisions of § 1, chap. 473, p. 819, Acts 1903, prohibiting employment of children under twelve years of age, was per se negligence, or at least evidence of negligence; and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury sustained by him. The appeal, for the first time, presents to us for construction and application the act passed by the legislature for the protection of young children by expressly prohibiting their employment in mills and factories. The first section is plain and calls for no construction by the court. It provides "that no child under twelve years of age shall be employed in any factory or manufacturing establishment in this state." The provision in regard to oyster-canning factories is not material to any question presented by this appeal. The 2d section prescribes the hours during which persons under eighteen years connection between the employment and the injury was clear, since, had the child not been employed by the company, there was no reason to suppose he would have been on the premises.

There are other cases that seem to confuse the question of negligence in violating the statute with the question of proximate cause.

Thus, in Belles v. Jackson, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 194, the court says: "The illegal employment . . . does not per se constitute negligence. Such employment must be the direct or proximate cause of the injury complained of." This seems to hold that the employment is negligence only where it is shown to be the proximate cause of the injury. The effect, of course, upon the child's right to recover, is the same as if the court had said that the wrongful employment was negligence, but that to entitle the child to recover it must be shown that the negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. The latter statement of the rule, however, is more accurate. The former statement is likely to cause confusion in thinking and an apparent conflict between cases which are really in harmony.

Again, in Evans v. American Iron & Tube Co. (C. C. N. D. Ohio, E. D.) 42 Fed. 519, where it was held that while, in a prosecution under a statute forbidding children under twelve years of age to be employed in factories, the fact of the wrongful employment would be all that was necessary to secure conviction, in a civil action for the injury other considerations might enter into the case before the defendant could be held liable for the illegal employment, the court said that in a civil case, where the illegal employment was the direct and proximate cause of the injury, the defendant would be liable; but that, if it was found that he gave the boy employment at a safe and easy task in an unexposed position, and that, if the child had stayed at his post, he would not have been injured, then the employment could not have been negligence or the proximate cause of the injury. Here, again, is found the same confusion of statement in regard to the two distinct questions of negligence and proximate cause. It may be true that on the facts stated the wrongful employment may not have been the proximate cause of the injury, but, nevertheless, such employment may have been negligence.

The mere employment of a child under twelve years of age in a factory contrary to statute is also held, in Kutchera v. Goodwillie, 93 Wis. 448, 67 N. W. 729, not to constitute actionable negligence, though it may subject the employers to the penalty prescribed by the statute.

There are other cases in which this question is raised, but not directly decided, the cases turning upon some other point, such as proximate cause, assumption of risk, or contributory negligence.

of age shall work. The 3d section provides that parents of children seeking employment shall give certificates in regard to their age, and makes any person knowingly and wilfully violating the provisions of the act indictable, etc. The act is the result of the well-considered, and we think wise, conclusion of the general assembly, reflecting and crystalizing into law the will of the people of the state. It is therefore not only our duty, but in entire harmony with our judgment, to give to the statute such a construction and application as will effectuate the intention of the general assembly, remedy and prevent the continuation of an evil which threatens the welfare of the young children, and, thereby, the best and highest interest of the state. Referring to, and applying the provisions of, an act in almost the same language as ours, the court of appeals in New York, in Marino v. Lehmaier, 173 N. Y. 530, 61 L.R.A. 811, 66 N. E. 572, says: "It has been said of the last century that it was the age of invention. Machines had been devised and constructed with which very many of the articles used by mankind were manufactured. Numerous factories had been established throughout the country filled with machines, many of which were easily operated, and the practice of employing boys and girls in their operation had become extensive, with the result that injuries to them were of frequent occurrence. We think it is very evident that these reasons induced the legislature to establish definitely an age limit under which children shall not be employed in factories." The supreme court of Tennessee, in Queen v. Dayton Coal & I. Co. 95 Tenn. 458, 30 L.R.A. 82, 49 Am. St. Rep. 935, 32 S. W. 460, held that the employment of a minor within the age prohibited by the statute was negligence; that the breach of the statute was actionable negligence. In Perry v. Tozer, 90 Minn. 431, 101 Am. St. Rep. 416, 97 N. W. 137, it is said: "Authorities of the highest respectability hold that the violation of a statute prohibiting the employment of a child in a hazardous occupation where such employment is prohibited by law establishes a right to recover for negligence; hence, in such cases, liability is to be presumed from the employment in disobedience of law. . .

Unless we can say that the statute has no effect in a suit for damages where the law had been violated, we are required to hold that the employment which the legislature positively forbids furnishes evidence tending to show, at least presumptively, that one of the causes of the injury in this case was the violation of the statute, in analogy to the well-known doctrine that ordinances regulating the hitching of horses, the speed of trains in cities, or other subjects of municipal control are held to be evidence to sustain the charge of negligence. . . . It is well settled that a wrongdoer is at least responsible for the results likely to occur, or resulting as a natural consequence from his misconduct, or such as might have been reasonably anticipated."

We have, in accordance with the uniform current of authority, held that the violation of a town ordinance regulating the speed of trains and street cars is at least evidence of negligence. Norton v. North Carolina R. Co. 122 N. C. 910, 29 S. E. 886; Edwards v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 129 N. C. 78, 39 S. E. 730; Davis v. Durham Traction Co. (at this term) 53 S. E. 617. The principle was applied to the violation of a statute requiring fire escapes to be maintained in houses rented to tenants. Willy v. Mulledy, 78 N. Y. 310, 34 Am. Rep. 536; Earl, J., saying: "Here was, then, an absolute duty imposed upon the defendant by statute to provide a fire escape, and the duty was imposed for the sole benefit of the tenants of the house, so that they would have a mode of escape in the case of a fire. For a breach of this duty, causing damage, it cannot be doubted that the tenants have a remedy." In Marino v. Lehmaier, supra, Parker, Ch. J., in a concurring opinion, says: "Against such an accident the state attempted to guard this boy, among others. But the defendant disregarded the law and employed and gave directions to one of the subjects of the state in violation of the state's policy, and the outcome of it was an injury to the child, which could not have happened had the law been observed. In such a case it would seem that the necessary and logical practice would be that the jury should be permitted to consider the violation of the statute, in connection with the other facts, as evidence tending to show negligence on the part of defendant." The learned chief judge cited a number of cases to sustain his conclusion. Before the passage of the statute the present chief justice, in Ward v. O'Dell Mfg. Co. 126 N. C. 946, 36 S. E. 194, speaking for two members of this court, said that, notwithstanding there was no statute prescribing the age within which children should not be employed in mills and factories, "there is an aspect in which the matter is for the courts; that is, whether it is negligence per se for a great factory to take children of such immature development of mind and body and expose them for twelve hours per day to the dangers incident to a great building filled with machinery constantly whirring at a high speed." The same line of thought is expressed and sustained by numerous authorities in Fitzgerald v. Alma Furniture Co. 131 N. C. 636, 42 S. E. 946. Certainly, with the positive prohibition imposed by the legislature against the employment of a child under twelve years of age, there can be no question that such employment is very strong, if not conclusive, evidence of negligence. If the age is known to the defendant, the employment is a positive defiance of the law; if the employment is without pursuing the method prescribed, and so easily followed, to learn the truth, its failure to do so gives it but little, if any, better status. Independent of the statute, the courts have uniformly held, and the text writers so declare, that the employment of young children either upon or in buildings where dangerous machinery is operated imposes the duty of carefully explaining to them the danger, and constant warning and watchfulness for their protection and safety. It is not an unreasonable burden upon employers, because they take children into their service with full knowledge of the risk to which they are exposed, and should be required to take the consequences of such employment.

We do not entertain any doubt that, upon the evidence before the court, the question of defendant's negligence should have been submitted to the jury. Defendant says that, notwithstanding its negligence, no cause of action accrued to plaintiff because the injury was not the proximate result of such negligence, but of an entirely unforeseen and unavoidable agency, the other boy who pulled the lever. It does not appear whether this boy was under twelve years of age. It has been frequently held that when persons negligently left dangerous machines or other instrumentalities exposed to the interference of children, and by reason thereof they have sustained injury, such result should have been contemplated as reasonably probable, fixing liability on the original negligent act. In this connection, it is said, in Marquette Third Vein Coal Co. v. Dielie, 110 Ill. App. 684, referring to the same suggestion made by defendant: "If plaintiff was injured while absent from the post of duty, or while violating his orders, or if it was carelessness or negligence for him to run between the sides of the moving cars and the mine wall, still, in our judgment, those facts would not prevent a recovery under the second count. The statute absolutely forbids the employment of a child of that age in a mine. One reason, no doubt, is that immature children are liable not to understand the significance and importance of the regulations prescribed for the mine and the employees therein. They may thoughtlessly disobey orders, or expose themselves to peril, or do acts which would be careless in an adult. The company which violates this statute ought not to be allowed to screen itself from liability because the child has been injured by reason of those childish traits which give rise to the statute. . . . Such laws are sustainable under the police powers of the state, and should be so construed as to accomplish the object sought to be attained, and to correct the evils sought to be remedied. Holding the employers of children in violation of this statute to a strict liability for any injury that may happen to the child while engaged in such inhibited employment ought to have a wholesome influence tending to check the evils against which this legislation is directed." The court concluded: "We hold defendant assumed all risks of injury to the boy arising from his employment in the mine." The court of appeals of New York, in Hickey v. Taaffe, 105 N. Y. 36, 12 N. E. 286, after discussing the duty of giving such instruction as will enable him to fully understand and appreciate the danger incurred, says: "If a person is so young that even after full instructions he wholly fails to understand them, and does not appreciate the dangers arising from a want of care, then he is too young for such employment, and an employer puts or keeps him at such work at his own risk." It is therefore a question for the jury to say whether, upon competent testimony, the plaintiff was given that full and careful instruction in regard to the danger incident to his employment, and whether he was capable of understanding such danger after instruction. Morris v. Stanfield, 81 Ill. App. 264, was an action by a minor for injuries sustained by an unprotected saw. The defendant contended the proximate cause of the injury was the interference of another person. The court said: "If appellee was under thirteen years of age, and was employed in appellant's factory, every day of his employment was a separate and distinct violation of law. . . . If it was negligence to put a boy under thirteen years of age at work in a factory within a few inches of an unprotected buzz saw, any act of negligence of a fellow servant, not wilfully intended to injure appellee, that brought him in contact with the saw, was a concurrent act of negligence. Such act may have been the immediate intervening cause, but the unlawful employment, continuing, was, in combination with the intervening act, a proximate cause of the injury." The principle was applied in Nagel v. Missouri P. R. Co. 75 Mo. 653, 42 Am. Rep. 418: The defendant owned or had control of a turntable located in a portion of the town where children were in the habit of playing. The turntable was not locked or otherwise fastened. The plaintiff's child, with other children, was playing upon it when the child was killed. In passing upon one of the defendant's exceptions, the court said: "It is also urged that the objection to the admission of the evidence should have been sustained because the petition shows that plaintiff's son was injured by the acts of other children in revolving the turntable. This point we think is not well taken. If defendant was negligent in not securing the turntable so that it could not be revolved by children to their injury, the mere fact that it was revolved by other children who were playing upon it at the time the child was injured will not excuse defendant, if such act ought to have been foreseen or anticipated by it. That it ought to have been foreseen and provided against is shown by the case of Koons v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. 65 Mo. 592." In Union P. R. Co. v. Fort, 17 Wall. 553, 21 L. ed. 739, in which a parent was suing for injury sustained by his son, a boy of sixteen years of age, the court said: "This boy occupied a very different position [from an adult]. How could he be expected to know the peril of the undertaking? He was a mere youth without experience and not familiar with machinery. Not being able to judge for himself, he had a right to rely on the judgment of Collett, and, doubtless, entered upon the execution of the order without apprehension of danger. Be this as it may, it was a wrongful act on the part of Collett to order a boy of his age and inexperience to do a thing which, in its very nature, was perilous, and which any man of ordinary sagacity would know to be so." In Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, it appeared that the defendant's servant left a horse and cart unhitched on the street. The plaintiff, with other children, was playing with the horse and climbing into the buggy, when the plaintiff was hurt by the horse moving away. To an action for damages, the defendant said that the plaintiff brought the injury upon himself. Denman, Ch. J., after discussing the conduct of the defendant's servant in leaving the horse unhitched, said: "But the question remains, Can the plaintiff then, consistently with the authorities, maintain his action, having been, at least, equally in fault? The answer is that, supposing that fact ascertained by the jury, but to this extent that he merely indulged the natural instinct of a child in amusing himself with the empty cart and deserted horse, then we think that the defendant cannot be permitted to avail himself of that fact. The most blamable carelessness of his servant having tempted the child, he ought not to reproach the child with yielding to that temptation. He has been the real and only cause of the mischief. He has been deficient in ordinary care. The child, acting without prudence or thought, has, however, shown these qualities in as great a degree as he could be expected to possess them." In Iron 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

& Wire Co. v. Green, 108 Tenn. 161, 65 S. W. 399, the same defense was made that the defendant's wrongful employment of the child was not the proximate cause of the injury. Beard, J., said: "It [defendant] had no right to employ this minor. While in its employment, on its premises, and foolishly playing with panels, the property of the company, too heavy for his strength to hold, yet with boyish heedlessness disregarding this fact, this injury is inflicted upon him. Had he not been employed by this company, there is no reason to suppose he would have been on its premises where the temptation occurred to him to prank with these panels to his serious hurt. In each of the propositions presented by the respective parties to the suit, we think there is causal connection between the employment and the injury." The doctrine is thus stated by Bailey, in his work on Personal Injuries (1291): "When the negligent act of the defendant naturally induced or offered opportunity for the subsequent act of a child, being of a character common to youthful indiscretion, and which, concurring with the defendant's earlier wrongful act, produced the injuries complained of, the defendant will in general be held liable. Children, wherever they go, must be expected to act upon childish instincts and impulses, a fact which all persons who are sui juris must consider and take precautions accordingly. A person who places in the hands of a child an article of a dangerous character, and one likely to do an injury to the child itself or to others, is liable in damages for injury resulting, which is a natural result of the original wrong, though there may be an intervening agency between the defendant's act and the injury." For this statement of the law the author cites a number of cases, among others, Lynch v. Nurdin, supra, which Mr. Beach says is the leading English case on the subject and has been generally followed in this country, both in the Federal and many of the state courts. Contrib. Neg. §§ 137-140; Stout v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 2 Dill. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 13,604, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745. This was one of the series known as the "Turntable Cases" (75 Mo. 653, 42 Am. Rep. 418). The case was tried by Judge Dillon, and on appeal Mr. Justice Hunt said: "The evidence is not strong, and the negligence is slight; but we are not able to say that there is not evidence sufficient to justify the verdict. . . . The charge was in all respects sound and judicious." In Queen v. Dayton Coal & I. Co. 95 Tenn. 464, 30 L.R.A. 83, 49 Am. St. Rep. 935, 32 S. W. 640, it is said: "Of course, we do not hold that, if the boy had died of organic disease of the heart, or from a stroke of paralysis, or from some cause wholly disconnected with his employment, the company would have been liable in damages simply on account of the employment in violation of the statute."

The learned counsel for defendants cite us to a number of cases more or less in conflict with the line of authorities which we have noted. In a few cases it is held that the statute prohibiting the employment of young children does not change the rule in respect to negligence, and that in such actions the rules and principles governing prior to the passage of the statute prevail. They are clearly out of harmony with the best considered and, we think, sound view. Several of them, upon the peculiar facts in the record, hold, as matter of law, that the violation of the statute was not the proximate cause of the injury. In other cases the alleged negligence was in the failure of defendant to box, or otherwise protect, machinery in the manner required by statutes, wherein it is held that plaintiff's recovery for injury sustained is barred by working with such machines in the presence of obvious danger, etc. The distinction between such cases and ours is pointed out in American Car & Foundry Co. v. Armentraut, 214 Ill. 609, 73 N. E. 766: "The distinction is that in those cases the employment of the servant was lawful. Here the employment was unlawful. The injury resulted from the unlawful employment, and while appellee was engaged in doing the precise thing that appellant directed him to do."

Defendant relies upon the decision of this court in Hendrix v. Cooleemee Cotton Mills, 138 N. C. 169, 50 S. E. 561. There the plaintiff was a boy of twelve years of age, hence not within the protection of the statute. The plaintiff, at the time of the injury, was, at the request of another boy, doing something entirely out of his line of employment. He was accustomed to the elevator. It must be conceded that expressions are to be found in the opinion tending to sustain the defendant's contention, but we think the cases may be distinguished. Plaintiff says: "After cutting lumps I then was a sweeper on the floor. I cleaned up about machines and around the floor. That evening at 4 o'clock we got out of the factory. The weigh boy went down the house to wash his hands. The man that ran that machine went down the house to clean up another machine. I was cleaning up that one I worked at. The weigh boy ran up and threw a piece of cut tobacco in the machine. I reached my hand in there to take it out. He pulled the lever and ran. . . . It was not after quitting time that I got hurt. If it was, all hands had not gotten out of the factory. No one told me to clean up the machine. I saw others cleaning up the machine, and I did so." There is much in this testimony from which a jury may reasonably have drawn the inference that the child was acting in the line of his employment. It may be that we do not correctly interpret his testimony, but it impresses us, with our knowledge of the alertness and desire of children to be useful as this child by seeking employment showed himself to be, that he thought it was his duty to take the piece of tobacco out of the machine. Certainly it is not a necessary, or even a fair, interpretation of his conduct that he was wanton and reckless. Is it not rather the conduct of a boy seeking to discharge his duty to his employer? It was for the jury to draw such inferences from his testimony as are reasonable. Stout v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. supra.

We think a reasonable construction of his conduct in taking the tobacco out of the machine is that he was, or reasonably supposed that he was, discharging his duty. He was, it seems, required to clean up the machine. We should hesitate to conclude that the other boy wilfully and therefore wickedly threw the lever deliberately intending to crush the plaintiff's hand. It is more in accordance with childish impulse that he did it to frighten the plaintiff and to see him jerk his hand back. While it was a reckless and wanton act, it was one of the freaks and pranks which might not unreasonably be anticipated from leaving boys together in a mill, surrounded by dangerous machinery. It was for that reason, among others, that the legislature prohibited the employment of children in such places. The fact that the statute was enacted, as we know, after several ineffectual efforts, puts an employer upon notice that in the eye of the law, based upon experience, it was dangerous to life and limb of children to be so employed and exposed to the very kind of danger by which the plaintiff was injured. To permit the defendant to escape liability for violating the statute, by saying that it did not anticipate this particular condition, with its disastrous results, would be to nullify the law. Of course, it did not anticipate this particular condition or result. If it had done so, the employment would have been not negligent, but criminal. Neither did the servant who left the horse unhitched, in Nurdin's Case, anticipate that children would play with and frighten the horse and cause the plaintiff to suffer injury; but the court held that he ought to have done so,—so in the Turntable Cases the same defense was made. If the plaintiff be required to show that, in every negligent act, the particular result was in fact anticipated, it would be difficult to maintain any action for injury sustained by the negligence of another. Drum v. Miller, 135 N. C. 204, 65 L.R.A. 890, 102 Am. St. Rep. 528, 47 S. E. 421. The law leaves the decision of the question of proximate cause to the jury, except when upon the facts but one inference could be drawn, as in the Turntable Cases and many others in the Reports. The state says to employers that they must not take the children under twelve years of age into their mills and factories; that to do so endangers their lives and limbs, dwarfs them mentally, morally, and physically; that it is upon the children that the permanent power and welfare of the state depend. They must not, below the tender and immature age fixed by the statute, be brought into contact with iron and steel machinery propelled by the powerful agencies of steam or electricity. Considered from any point of view,—the right of the child to have the opportunity to grow to at least the age named in the statute in a pure atmosphere, without danger of mutilation of body, dwarfing of mind, and to attend the schools provided by the state,—the legislation is founded upon a wise and humane policy. Its violation followed by injury gives a cause of action to the child upon the elementary principle that, "when ever the common law, a statute . . . imposes on one a duty, if of a sort affecting the public within the principle of the criminal law, a breach of it is indictable, and a civil action will lie in favor of any person who has suffered specially therefrom; or, if the matter of the law involves only the interests of individuals, anyone who has received harm from another's disobedience may have his suit against him for the damages." Bishop, Non-Contract Law, § 132; Greenlee v. Southern R. Co. 122 N. C. 977, 41 L.R.A. 399, 65 Am. St. Rep. 734, 30 S. E. 115; Comyns, Dig. p. 453; Troxler v. Southern R. Co. 124 N. C. 189, 44 L.R.A. 313, 70 Am. St. Rep. 580, 32 S. E. 550. The defendant says, whatever its breach of duty may have been, the plaintiff was negligent, and by such negligence contributed to his injury. The authorities cited by the learned counsel, applied to the conduct of an adult or one not within the protection of the statute, fully sustain their contention.

But when we come to measure the duty of the child in regard to the exercise of care for his safety, an entirely different principle controls. Within certain ages, courts hold children incapable of contributory negligence. We do not find any case, nor do we think it sound doctrine, to say that a child of twelve years comes within that class. Adopting the standard of the law in respect to criminal liability, we think that a child under twelve years of age is presumed to be incapable of so understanding and appreciating danger from the negligent act or conditions produced by others as to make him guilty of contributory negligence. Mr. Labatt says: "The essential and controlling conception by which a minor's right of action is determined, with reference to the existence or absence of contributory fault, . . . the measure of his responsibility. If he has not the ability to foresee and avoid the danger to which he may be exposed, negligence will not be imputed to him if he unwittingly exposes himself to that danger. For the exercise of such measure of capacity and discretion as he possesses, he is responsible." Mast. & S. § 348. It is in such cases a question for the jury. 4 Thomp. Neg. § 4587; Beach, Contrib. Neg. 136. "Whether he could be guilty of contributory negligence or not was a question of fact to be determined by the jury, dependent upon the other fact whether it had been shown that deceased had capacity to be guilty of contributory negligence. Between seven and fourteen a child is prima facie incapable of exercising judgment and discretion, but evidence may be received to show capacity." Tutwiler Coal, Coke & I. Co. v. Enslen, 129 Ala. 336, 30 So. 600; Glover v. Gray, 9 Ill. App. 329. In several cases it is held that, when a statute is violated and results in the injury of the child, the defense of contributory negligence is not open to the defendant. American Car & Foundry Co. v. Armentraut, 214 Ill. 509, 73 N. E. 766. The better view seems to be otherwise. The Tennessee court, after discussing the question, concludes: "It is hardly necessary to add that contributory negligence on the part of a minor is to be measured by his age and his ability to discern and appreciate circumstances of danger. He is not chargeable with the same degree of care as an experienced adult, but is only required to exercise such prudence as one of his years may be expected to possess." "As the standard of care thus varies with the age, capacity, and experience of the child, it is usually, if not always, where the child is not wholly irresponsible, a question of fact for the jury whether a child exercised the ordinary care and prudence of a child similarly situated; and, if such care was exercised, a recovery can be had for an injury negligently inflicted, no matter how far the care used by the child falls short of the standard which the law exacts for determining what is ordinary care in a person of full age and capacity." 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 409; Plumley v. Birge, 124 Mass. 57, 26 Am. Rep. 645.

His Honor erroneously sustained the demurrer to the evidence. In the light of the testimony, he should have submitted the case to the jury, instructing them that, if they found the facts as testified to, the defendant was guilty of negligence in employing the plaintiff, either knowing his age, or failing to have the certificate of his parents as provided by the statute; that, if they found that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, they should answer the first issue "Yes." In regard to the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff, he should have instructed the jury in accordance with the principles announced by the authorities herein cited. The jury could take into consideration the age, intelligence, and knowledge of the plaintiff in regard to the machine and his capacity to know and appreciate the danger. We have given to the questions presented upon this appeal a careful examination. It is the first time that we have had occasion to construe the statute, and it is conceded that the courts of other states are not uniform in the construction given similar statutes. It is a matter of importance to employers of labor in mills and factories to know the standard of their rights and liabilities. The industrial life and development of the state are not only consistent with, but promoted by, the exclusion of young children from mills and factories. The child, educated and developed before beginning work of this kind, becomes not only more useful and efficient, but in all respects a better citizen.

While not necessary to the decision of this appeal, we note that the 1st section of chapter 473, p. 819, Laws 1903, is omitted from the Revisal. The statute, as incorporated in §§ 3362-3364, Revisal 1905, makes the prohibition dependent upon "knowingly and wilfully" employing a child. The original act, in declaring the prohibition, did not contain these words. Section 3, making the employment of the child a misdemeanor, properly required the act to be done "knowingly and wilfully." The omission of § 1 was doubtless an oversight. It may be of importance in the trial of actions, such as this, for injuries sustained, in regard to the burden of proof. We simply note this change to the end that, if the general assembly should desire, they may restore § 1, which, under the language of the enacting and repealing clauses of the Revisal, would seem to be repealed.

There must be a new trial.

J. A. MORTON, Appt.,

v.

OREGON SHORT LINE RAILWAY COMPANY, Resp't.

(— Or. —, 87 Pac. 151.)

Water—flood—right to combat.

1. The swollen current of a stream during floods, which has not become separated from the main body of the stream, is not surface water which the riparian proprietor may combat as a common enemy, to the injury of adjoining proprietors.

Riparian right—jetty.

2. A riparian proprietor cannot, even to protect his own land, project jetties into the stream if the effect is to deflect the current or shoal the water to the injury of a lower proprietor.

Same—channel—island and main land.

3. The passage between an island and the main land through which a portion of the river flows is a channel which cannot be obstructed by one riparian owner to the injury of another.

Evidence—judicial notice.

4. The court will take judicial notice of the laws of nature.

Injunction—deflection of stream.

5. Injunction will lie to compel the removal of a jetty placed in a stream in such a manner as to deflect the current to the injury of a lower riparian owner by depriving him of the natural flow of the stream and washing away his bank by casting the water directly against it.

(October 23, 1906.)

Case Note.—Right of upper proprietor to deflect water in stream to the injury of lower proprietors:—As shown in 2 Farnham on Waters, p. 1565, one of the rights of a riparian owner is to have the stream flow as nature directs. One consequence of the interference with the flow by an upper proprietor may be to deflect the current so as to cast it directly against the banks of the lower proprietor, the inevitable consequence of which would be the washing away or destruction of a portion of his land. The authority, so far as it exists, is to the effect that such action on the part of the upper proprietor is wrongful, even though it is done by the upper proprietor for the purpose of protecting his own property. Gillespie v. Forrest, 18 Hun, 110; Dayton v. Robert, 8 Ohio C. C. 649. So, if the water is taken out of the stream, it cannot be returned at such an angle that the current will cause injury to the property of the lower owner. Briscoe v. Young, 131 N. C. 386, 42 S. E. 893; Valley R. Co. v. Franz, 43 Ohio St. 623, 4 N. E. 88. So, an upper proprietor cannot cut a tail race so as to turn the water into the foot, instead of the head, of another proprietor's pond, if the result will be to hasten the flow of the water and APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Malheur County in defendant's favor in a suit to enjoin interference with the current of a stream. Reversed.

Statement by Moore, J.:

This is a suit by J. A. Morton against the Oregon Short Line Railway Company, a corporation, to enjoin the maintenance of obstructions to the flow of water in a stream. The complaint states, in substance, that the plaintiff is the owner of certain real property in section 28, township 18 S., of range 47 E., in Malheur county, which land lies west of and borders on the Snake river; that in 1904, the defendant built above such premises in the west channel of the stream certain dams which deflected the water, depositing sediment in the channel, and shoaling it so as to prevent the operation of plaintiff's private ferryboat from his land to an island in the river, and also depriving his arid land of water from the river for subirrigation; that these obstructions caused another channel to form in such a direction as to force a current directly against the bank of his land, cutting away a wide margin thereof, and, if such encroachment is permitted to continue, it will force a channel through a depression in his premises, making an island of a part thereof fill the pond with sand. Hulme v. Shreve, 4 N. J. Eq. 116. The rule applies not only to piers and projections from the shore, but also to structures placed in the bed of the stream. Spencer v. Hartford, P. & F. R. Co. 10 R. I. 14. Therefore, a railroad company will be liable for deflecting a current to the injury of a lower proprietor by the construction of a bridge pier in the river. De Baker v. Southern California R. Co. 106 Cal. 257, 46 Am. St. Rep. 237, 39 Pac. 610. Although in that case the court held that, since the railroad company was acting under authority of a municipal corporation, if the injury was caused by a defective plan, for the consequences of which the city would not be liable, the railroad company would not be liable. This latter ruling is erroneous, however, since the deflection of the current so as to injure the lower property constitutes a taking or injury of it within the protection of the Constitution. The injury, however, must be such as could reasonably have been foreseen, and, therefore, there is no liability for injuries caused by a flood rushing through an opening left for the passage of logs. Lehigh Bridge Co. v. Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. 4 Rawle, 9, 26 Am. Dec. 111. And a successor in title to the one who erects the structure will not be liable for injuries caused by it if he assumed no duty with respect to it, and does not adopt or interfere with it in any way. Fordyce v. Russell, 59 Ark. 312, 27 S. W. 82. Opposed to the above authorities is a Vermont case decided in 1858, Henry v. Vermont C. R. Co. 30 Vt. 638, 73 Am. Dec. 329, which the court says is one of new impression. The court also says that, since no brief or argument had been submitted on the part of plaintiff, it may have failed to apprehend the true ground of plaintiff's claim. In that case it appeared that the railroad company had built piers in the river which turned the current directly against the bank of the plaintiff, an owner of land farther down the stream, the effect of which was to cut out and wash away a large quantity of the land. The court denied the right of action for three reasons: First, it was not a cause of injury whose operation could be calculated or limited in its extent and operation, or defined in any 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) mode, and, by consequence, not one which, in the nature of things, could be guarded against; second, it is not a cause of damage which inevitably produces its effect, but only one which, in its operation, may require greater precautions against injury to be used by proprietors below; hence, the law rather chooses to leave each proprietor to guard his own shore than to require riparian owners above to forego any use of the water which they deem beneficial to themselves. Thus, mill owners, or those who may use water from a running stream, have never been required to restore the water to the stream at any particular points, or so as to leave the force and direction of the stream precisely the same as before; third, the act complained of is merely consequentially injurious, producing no direct injury, like the flowing of land, even by means of an obstruction in a running stream. And the damage to the riparian owner below is so remote and uncertain a consequence that the law has not held the owner above liable for such consequences. From the fact that the court so completely misapprehended the rights of the respective owners, and departed so completely from the principles which have been adopted by other courts, it would seem that this decision is of little value. So, in Covington Harbor Co. v. Phoenix Bridge Co. 10 Ohio Dec. Reprint. 657, which was an attempt to recover damages for injuries caused by an exercise of authority granted by the United States government, a lower court in Ohio held that it was bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which hold that an exercise of the sovereign power which is not a physical encroachment upon private property, and causes only consequential and indirect damages to it, is not a taking of private property for public use, and gives no right of action; and therefore it denied recovery. While that decision is to some extent supported by analogous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, it would seem that such decisions so far ignore the constitutional property rights of individuals that the Constitution, and not the dictum of the court, would prevail, and that, therefore, a decision based upon such reasoning was of little value.

to his irreparable injury, to redress which he has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. The answer denied the material allegations of the complaint, and averred, in effect, that in 1883 the defendant built its railroad through Malheur county on the right of way now occupied thereby and thereafter maintained its roadbed and track, operating trains thereon for the benefit of the public; that at the time the railroad was constructed the water of Snake river, during each freshet, flowed through a swale situated between the roadbed and the west channel of the river, and the floods in that stream have cut and are cutting away the bank near the track, thereby endangering the roadbed to such an extent that the defendant was compelled to build the obstructions complained of, to prevent its property from being destroyed; and that the swale is the so-called channel referred to in the complaint as the west channel of the river, but that such swale is, and at the time the railroad was constructed was, at least 300 feet west of the west channel of Snake river. The reply having put in issue the allegations of new matter in the answer, the cause was referred, and from the testimony taken the court made certain findings and dismissed the suit, from which decree the plaintiff appeals.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The transcript shows that the plaintiff is the owner of the real property mentioned, and that his land borders on the west bank of the Snake river. The township referred to was surveyed in 1874, and the field notes thereof, a copy of which was offered in evidence, show that the left bank of the river, as meandered, then intersected the south boundary of section 33 at a point 68.35 chains east of the southwest corner of that section, and extended northwesterly by a curved line to a point west, but near the center, of section 33; thence, by a similar line northeasterly, to a point east of the northeast corner of that section; thence westerly and northerly by a curved line to a point west of, but near the center of, section 28; and thence northeasterly to a point 2.80 chains east of the northeast corner of the latter section. A sketch of the margin of the river, as indicated, will disclose that, when the government survey was made, the stream flowed around a peninsula over which the boundary between sections 28 and 33 extended. The defendant, in 1883, constructed its railroad from Huntington, Oregon, southerly through the premises hereinbefore described, and also through adjoining land on the south, now owned by H. M. Plummer. The defendant offered in evidence a blue print of the locus in quo, reduced to a scale of 400 feet to the inch, which indicates the original course of the river as meandered, the line of the railway as constructed, and other data. It appears from this plat that the railroad was built about 14 rods west of the meander line at the bend near the center of section 28, and about 52 rods west thereof at the curve near the middle of section 33. An extraordinary freshet in Snake river in 1894 cut across the base of the peninsula a new channel, which extends northeasterly over what theretofore had been a meadow. Prior to such change, a large part of the river below the peninsula flowed in a channel that separated plaintiff's land from Datey island, east of his premises; but, after such flood, the greater volume of water flowed east of that island. Immediately north of section 33, but south of Datey island, the change in the channel of Snake river formed a large sand bar, constituting an island, the surface of which was above the ordinary stage of water. The bar is separated from the left bank of the river by a narrow channel which extends northerly, and is also severed from Datey island by a broader channel that extends northwesterly; the waters of which unite and flow by plaintiff's premises. The freshet adverted to and the annual floods in the river have washed away the left bank of the stream in sections 28 and 33, nearly to the east line of the right of way of the railroad, and, to prevent further injury therefrom, the defendant placed several hundred car loads of rock along the margin of the river; and in 1903, with Plummer's consent, it built, where the swale had been, five jetties that extend from the bank down stream at an acute angle with the thread thereof. These obstructions were made by driving parallel rows of piling about 12 feet apart, and filling the intervening space with brush and rock. The lower jetty is about 215 feet long, and extends nearly across the channel west of the sand bar at the head thereof. The other jetties are from 50 to 75 feet in length. Another extraordinary freshet in 1904 caused the bank of plaintiff's land, for a distance of about half a mile, to be washed away to the depth of 100 feet or more, whereupon he instituted this suit, and, at the trial, offered testimony tending to show that the lower jetty prevented the water from flowing in the channel west of the sand bar, thereby permitting the current in the channel between the bar and Datey island to flow nearly at right angles against his bank, damaging it; that the closing of the channel west of the sand bar caused sediment to be deposited, shoaling the channel east of his land, and preventing him from operating, by force of the current, a ferryboat which he maintained for his own use from his premises to Datey island, a part of which he held by a lease from year to year, and another part thereof was claimed by his son as a homestead where cattle were pastured in which he had an interest; and that, if the lower jetty be maintained, the diminution of water in the channel will prevent the subirrigation of his land, which is arid, and will also permit the water in the channel north of the sand bar to cut into a swale on his premises, thereby forming a new course through his land and creating an island. The testimony, relating to the injury which it is claimed will result to plaintiff's land by the maintenance of the lower jetty, though given by persons living in the vicinity of his premises, who are acquainted therewith, know the character of the soil, and the effect thereon of freshets in the river, consists of the opinions of several witnesses, and it is possible that the disastrous consequences which they predict may not eventuate. It was stipulated that three civil engineers who were employed by the defendant would, if present, testify that in the early spring of 1906, they made accurate measurements of the left bank of the river through the plaintiff's premises, setting stakes along the margin of the stream, and that returning to his land in the latter part of July, after the annual freshet had subsided, they found that no part of the bank had been washed away during that season, but that the water in the river in 1906 was not as high as it was the preceding year. The foregoing is deemed a fair statement of the material facts involved, and based thereon, the question to be determined is whether or not the jetties can legally be maintained where they are built. The defendant's counsel insist that, the river having suddenly changed its channel in 1904, thereby endangering the railroad track, their client, to protect its property, was authorized to restore the flow of the stream to its original bed, and hence the decree should be affirmed.

It has been held that the person across whose land a freshet in a natural stream suddenly causes a new channel to be formed may, within a reasonable time, restore the flow of water to its original bed. Farnham. Waters, § 491; Mathewson v. Hoffman, 77 Mich. 420, 6 L.R.A. 349, 43 N. W. 879. It will be remembered that the defendant built the jetties into the river from the bank of Plummer's land with his consent, and, as he is a riparian proprietor on the new channel, the railway company, as his licensee, secured such right to change the flow of the current as he possessed. Slater v. Fox, 5 Hun, 544. An examination of the blue print referred to shows that the upper jetty is built nearly half a mile below the original meander line of the river where it commenced to cut the new channel, and, as the barriers complained of do not force the water around the peninsula, they were evidently constructed to prevent injury to the railroad grade by deflecting the current. Instead, therefore, of attempting to restore the stream to its ancient channel, the defendant, by building the jetties, has in fact recognized the new way as the true water course, and tried to confine it to the bed as at first made. The swollen current of Snake river during floods is nevertheless a part of that stream, at the place where the jetties are built, and not surface water, within the accepted meaning of that term, against which a land proprietor may combat as he would oppose a common enemy, though he thereby injures the real property of others. Price v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 47 Or. 350, 83 Pac. 843. The defendant's counsel, in support of the decree rendered, cite the case of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clark, 41 C. C. A. 597, 101 Fed. 678, upon the authority of which the trial court evidently relied. In that case a railroad company, to protect its roadbed, a part of which had been washed away by the gradual change of the channel of a river, built dikes some distance from the bank of the stream on what was formerly solid ground, to restore the current to its original channel. These dikes encroached upon the channel as it existed when they were built, and deflecting the current a subsequent freshet in the river washed away part of the land of a riparian proprietor, who, in an action to recover the damages sustained, secured a judgment, in reversing which the circuit court of appeals says: "A riparian owner may construct the necessary embankments, dikes, or other structures to maintain his bank of the stream in its original condition, or to restore it to that condition, and to bring the stream back to its natural course; and, if he does no more, riparian owners upon the opposite or upon the same side of the stream can recover no damages for the injury his action causes them." In that case, as the means adopted to prevent the roadbed from injury from encroachments of the channel consisted of dikes, the term "other structures," referred to in the opinion quoted, evidently means similar formations, and not jetties placed in a stream to deflect its course. The conclusion reached in the case adverted to is at variance with the rule announced in Gerrish v. Clough, 48 N. H. 9, 97 Am. Dec. 561, 2 Am. Rep. 165, where it was held that, though a riparian proprietor was authorized to protect the bank of his land from injury from the encroachment of a natural stream, he could not, without incurring liability, erect any structure for that purpose which would injure the property of others. These cases illustrate the conflict that exists in respect to this important subject. Which rule is founded on the better reason, or supported by the greater weight of judicial utterance, is not necessary to a decision herein.

The words "embankment" and "dike," when used to represent the means employed to prevent the inundation of land, are synonymous, and mean a structure of earth or other material usually placed upon the bank of a stream or near the shore of a lake, bay, etc., the ends of which extend across low land to higher ground, forming a continuous bulwark or obstruction to water, and designed to keep it without the inclosure thus formed. A dam, however, is a structure, composed of wood, earth, or other material, erected in and usually extending across the entire channel at right angles to the thread of the stream, and intended to retard the flow of water by the barrier, or to retain it within the obstruction. A jetty is a kind of a dam, usually built in the manner hereinbefore described, and intended to deflect the current so as to deepen the channel or to form an eddy below the obstruction in which sediment may be deposited, thereby extending and protecting the bank. Assuming, without deciding, that an embankment may be built by a riparian proprietor to prevent his land from being submerged in extraordinary freshets, we think a jetty cannot be classed as "other structures," specified in the case relied upon, and that when they, by deflecting the current or by shoaling the water, injure a lower riparian proprietor, the author of the obstruction violates the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. One of the issues to be tried is the identity of the water course west of the sand bar at the head of which the long jetty is built. "The channel," says a distinguished text writer, "is the passageway between the banks through which the water of the stream flows." Farnham, Waters, § 417. This definition was undoubtedly intended to apply only to the entire uninterrupted space occupied by water flowing between well-defined banks. The description of a channel, as given by the learned author, is broad enough, however, to include the flow of water between an island and a bank of a stream, and hence the exact meaning of the word embraces the passageway that was obstructed by the defendant's lower jetty. As the blue print shows this to be a water course which is indicated by the explanatory words: "Very swift and shallow;" and shows the passageway to be the most westerly route, we have no doubt that it is, as alleged in the complaint, the west channel of the Snake river.

It appears from the transcript that the lower jetty was intended to close this entire channel, but that the water, deflected by the angle of the barrier, washed the sand from the outer end of the obstruction, permitting a part of the current to continue in the bed of the stream west of the sand bar, but causing the greater volume to flow east thereof. As a jetty is a species of dam, and the lower obstruction deprives a riparian proprietor of the accustomed flow of water in the channel of the stream, is the deprivation of the right which is incident to the estate such an injury as will authorize the granting of the relief sought? The plaintiff and his witnesses express the opinion that, if the water is permitted to flow in the west channel, it will continue its course along the bank of his land and diverge the current, which otherwise strikes his premises at nearly right angles. This consensus of opinion is not based on observations as to the effect of the water at the line of injury to plaintiff's land during the flood of 1904, but the consequences assumed, though speculative, seem so reasonable and dependent upon the laws of nature, of which a court will take judicial notice, that we are forced to the determination that injury must necessarily result to plaintiff's premises, and to his property rights incident thereto, if another freshet should occur in the river. The conclusion thus reached makes such a case as entitles the plaintiff to equitable intervention, but, as the lower jetty is the only one of which he seriously complains, that obstruction only will be ordered abated.

The defendant's objections to the plaintiff's right to institute this suit and to prosecute this appeal not being deemed important, the decree is reversed, and one will be entered here requiring the defendant, within three months from the entry of a mandate herein in the lower court, to remove the long or lower jetty; the plaintiff to recover his costs and disbursements in both courts.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

GEORGE G. HERRING, Appt.,
v.
J. WILTON.

(— Va. —, 55 S. E. 546.)

Nuisance—howling dogs—injunction.

1. The maintenance of howling and barking dogs and whining puppies on neighboring premises, to the great and continuous annoyance and discomfort of a property holder and his family, so that their rest is broken, sleep interrupted, and their reasonable use and enjoyment of their home disturbed, is a nuisance subject to be enjoined.

Same—equity jurisdiction—remedy at law.

2. The jurisdiction of equity to abate a nuisance is not destroyed by the passage of a municipal ordinance purporting to award an easy and expeditious remedy for the inconvenience caused thereby.

(November 22, 1906.)

Case Note.—Keeping of barking dogs as a nuisance:—There seems to be no question but that the barking of dogs may become such a nuisance as to entitle persons annoyed thereby to some remedy to prevent it; but the question whether a nuisance exists depends upon the extent of the annoyance. Thus Brill v. Flagler, 23 Wend. 354, which is fully set out in HERRING v. WILTON, sustains the right to kill a dog which is in the constant habit of coming on one's premises and about his dwelling day and night, barking and howling, to the great annoyance and disturbance of the peace and quiet of his family, if the nuisance cannot be removed in any other way.

And in Laverty v. Hogan, 2 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 197, the court remarks obiter, on the authority of Brill v. Flagler, supra, that dogs accustomed to bark at night and disturb the neighborhood are nuisances; and they may be killed by any person annoyed thereby.

And Hubbard v. Preston, 90 Mich. 221, 15 L.R.A. 249, 30 Am. St. Rep. 426, 51 N. W. 269, sustains the right of one to shoot into a large pack of dogs, where such dogs have

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Rockingham County enjoining the keeping of dogs upon his property in such a way as to constitute a nuisance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. B. Stephenson and H. W. Bertram, for appellant:

The foundation for the interference of equity in restraint of nuisance rests in the necessity of preventing irreparable mischief.

High, Inj. p. 565; Wade v. Miller, 188 Mass. 6, 69 L.R.A. 820, 73 N. E. 849; Powell v. Bentley & G. Furniture Co. 34 W. Va. 804, 12 L.R.A. 53, 12 S. E. 1086.

When a summary remedy is provided by statute for the abatement of nuisances, a court of equity may properly refuse to interfere.

Messrs. Sipe & Harris, for appellee:

To constitute a nuisance, it is sufficient if the noxious thing produces that which is offensive to the senses, and which renders the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable.

The jurisdiction of a court of equity to become an intolerable nuisance by congregating about his premises, barking, quarreling, and fighting there, if it is a reasonable and necessary means of ridding himself of the nuisance.

And in Woolf v. Chalker, 31 Conn. 121, 81 Am. Dec. 175, the court states obiter that the dog is a noisy animal, and may in that way become a nuisance and be destroyed; but that whether dogs kept on the premises of their owner may, by their noise, become nuisances to adjoining proprietors so as to subject their owners to an action for a nuisance seems to be an open question.

And in Force v. Dahn, 10 N. J. L. J. 252, as digested in 37 Century Dig. col. 1553, an order to show cause why a nuisance consisting of the barking of a dog, constantly annoying the neighbors at night, should not be enjoined, was allowed.

But in Street v. Tugwell, 2 Selwyn, N. P. 4th Am. ed. 299, a verdict was rendered for defendant in an action on the case for keeping dogs so near plaintiff's dwelling as to disturb him in the enjoyment thereof, although the evidence showed that some six or seven pointers were kept so near his restrain by an injunction the creation or continuance of a nuisance which is likely to produce irreparable injury is well established and constantly exercised.

Although the nuisance sought to be enjoined may be punished criminally, such punishment does not prevent the exercise of the restraining power of equity.

High, Inj. § 572; 2 Beach, Inj. § 1048, p. 1044; Hull v. Watts, 95 Va. 13, 27 S. E. 829.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Wilton, the appellee in this court, filed a bill in the circuit court of Rockingham county, in which he states that he is a resident of the town of Harrisonburg, and that contiguous to him is the property occupied by George Herring; that for three years past Herring has maintained on the lot on which he resides a kennel, about 100 or 125 feet distant from Wilton's residence, in which he is breeding dogs for sale, having at times as many as seven or eight, and rarely so few as two or three; that the dogs keep up an incessant barking, especially during the night, by which the complainant and his family are so annoyed and disturbed as to be prevented from obtaining such sleep and rest as health requires; that, by reason of the repetition of this nuisance, he has become an intolerable nuisance by congregating about his premises, barking, quarreling, and fighting there, if it is a reasonable and necessary means of ridding himself of the nuisance.

And in Woolf v. Chalker, 31 Conn. 121, 81 Am. Dec. 175, the court states obiter that the dog is a noisy animal, and may in that way become a nuisance and be destroyed; but that whether dogs kept on the premises of their owner may, by their noise, become nuisances to adjoining proprietors so as to subject their owners to an action for a nuisance seems to be an open question.

And in Force v. Dahn, 10 N. J. L. J. 252, as digested in 37 Century Dig. col. 1553, an order to show cause why a nuisance consisting of the barking of a dog, constantly annoying the neighbors at night, should not be enjoined, was allowed.

But in Street v. Tugwell, 2 Selwyn, N. P. 4th Am. ed. 299, a verdict was rendered for defendant in an action on the case for keeping dogs so near plaintiff's dwelling as to disturb him in the enjoyment thereof, although the evidence showed that some six or seven pointers were kept so near his house that his family were prevented from sleeping during the night, and were greatly disturbed during the day; and Lord Kenyon refused a new trial. He stated, however, that, if defendant continued the nuisance, plaintiff might bring a new action if he deemed it advisable.

And Bowers v. Horen, 93 Mich. 420, 17 L.R.A. 773, 32 Am. St. Rep. 513, 53 N. W. 535, denies one's right to kill his neighbor's valuable dog, of which he has never made complaint, although knowing the owner, merely because it barked around his house at night, and had caused him other annoyance by chasing cats into trees, and leaving tracks on his freshly painted porch, and had once been found in his henhouse, in which he did no damage except, perhaps, to break one egg.

And Jacquay v. Hartzell, 1 Ind. App. 500, 27 N. E. 1105, denied the right to kill a dog because it was in the habit of going from its master's premises and barking at travelers and teams passing along the highway, where it was not vicious and did not attack or imperil the safety of anyone, and was not barking at the time it was killed.

come extremely nervous, at times almost unfit to attend to business; that the health of his family is being seriously and permanently impaired, and they are being deprived of the use and enjoyment of their home; that he has complained to Herring, but is unable to obtain from him any permanent relief; and that complainant, impelled by the desire to avoid litigation between himself and a neighbor, has borne with the situation until he can no longer endure it without serious and permanent injury to the health of himself and his family. He further avers that Herring is without visible means to respond in damages to an action at law, and charges that any judgment against him commensurate with the damage sustained will be wholly unavailing. He prays that Herring, his agents, etc., may be enjoined from keeping upon his premises dogs causing the injurious noises and disturbances complained of; that the nuisance of the kennel may be discontinued and abated; and for general relief.

A temporary injunction was granted in accordance with the prayer of the bill, and at a subsequent day the defendant answered the bill, admitting that for a number of years he has been keeping a few dogs for his own pleasure, and for the profits derived from their sale, but denying that they have been creating a nuisance to the plaintiff and his family, or that the dogs kept by him could have been a nuisance to anyone in a normal condition of health and nerves. He denies that he has kept the number of dogs with which he is charged in the bill, and states in detail the number kept by him at various times. He denies that he is unable to respond in damages for any nuisance he may have occasioned; and finally claims that the plaintiff's annoyance is due to his nervous temperament, and asserts that neither the plaintiff nor any member of his family has ever been made ill or prevented from attending to business.

Upon these issues evidence was taken, and, the case coming on to be heard, the circuit court perpetuated the temporary injunction, and Herring obtained an appeal from one of the judges of this court.

We think the weight of evidence establishes that plaintiff and his family were subjected to great and continuous annoyance and discomfort by the howling and barking of the dogs and the whining of puppies upon the premises of appellant; that their rest has been broken, their sleep interrupted; and that they have been seriously disturbed in the reasonable use and enjoyment of their home.

of the court, says: "In all such cases, the question is whether the nuisance complained of will or does produce such a condition of things as, in the judgment of reasonable men, is naturally productive of actual physical discomfort to persons of ordinary sensibilities, and of ordinary tastes and habits, and as, in view of the circumstances of the case, is unreasonable and in derogation of the rights of the complainant."

In Spelling on Injunctions, § 431, it is said that "noises which tend to disturb rest and quiet in the neighborhood may be restrained. . . . To warrant an injunction against a noise as a nuisance it must be shown that the noise is such as to produce actual physical discomfort to a person of ordinary sensibilities, and is unreasonably and unnecessarily made."

In Brill v. Flagler, 23 Wend. 357, a case in which Flagler sued Brill for killing his dog, and the defendant pleaded that the dog was accustomed to come upon the premises of the defendant in the nighttime as well as in the daytime, and, by his barking and howling, annoy and disturb the defendant and his family, speaking of this plea the court said: I am of opinion that the facts which the plea sets up constitute a bar to the action. "The demurrer admits that the dog was in the constant habit of coming on the premises, and about the dwelling of the defendants, day and night, barking and howling, to the great annoyance and disturbance of the peace and quiet of the family; that the plaintiff was fully advised of this mischievous propensity of the animal, and willfully neglected to confine him, and that defendants, unable to remove the nuisance in any other way, killed him. No other authority than the experience and observation of every man is necessary to enable him to determine that the matters set forth in this plea constitute a private nuisance to the inmates of a family, and, upon general principles, justify all reasonable means to remove it. It would be mockery to refer a party to his remedy by action. It is far too dilatory and impotent for the exigency of the case. Whatsoever unlawfully annoys, or does damage to another, is a nuisance, and may be abated by the party aggrieved, so as he commits no riot in the doing of it."

That case, it is true, was an action at law, but it states clearly and forcibly the annoyance and inconvenience arising from the barking and howling of dogs, that they constitute a nuisance, and in that case excused what would otherwise have been a trespass. It declares that the remedy by action at law would be a mockery and far too dilatory and impotent for the exigency of the case, thus presenting a case for the interposition of a court of equity. It is true, also, that in that case the dog came upon the premises of the man who shot him. It was, therefore, somewhat in the nature of a trespass, while a nuisance generally results from the commission of an act beyond the limits of the property affected. High, Inj. 2d ed. § 739. Especially is this true of noises; and many other illustrations might be added. Dogs in a neighbor's yard may effectually murder sleep, and destroy the reasonable enjoyment of a home.

It is urged on the part of plaintiff in error that an ordinance of the town of Harrisonburg afforded an easy and expeditious remedy for whatever inconvenience appellee may have suffered.

In Kelly v. Lehigh Min. & Mfg. Co. 98 Va. 405, 81 Am. St. Rep. 736, 36 S. E. 511, this court said: "Where courts of equity have once acquired jurisdiction, a subsequent statute which gives to or enlarges the jurisdiction of the common-law courts over the same subject does not deprive the equity courts of their jurisdiction, although the statute may furnish a complete and adequate remedy at law, unless the statute conferring such jurisdiction uses prohibitory or restrictive words." And this was reiterated in Steinman v. Vicars, 99 Va. 595, 39 S. E. 227, where it was said: "Where courts of equity have once acquired jurisdiction, . . . they do not lose such jurisdiction merely because courts of law have been subsequently authorized to administer the same or similar relief." Spelling, Inj. §§ 398, 399.

We are of opinion that a court of equity has jurisdiction in such matters, and that in this case it has been properly exercised.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

RUSSELL WAYLAND, Appt.,

BOARD OF SCHOOL DIRECTORS OF SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1, in Seattle, et al., Resp'ts.

(— Wash. —, 86 Pac. 642.)

Schools—secret societies—regulation.

A board of school directors has, under a statute authorizing it to adopt rules and regulation for the well-being of the school, authority to debar members of high-school fraternities organized against its will, although with consent of parents of the pupils, and meeting out of school hours, from participating in certain privileges attendant on membership in the school, such as connection with athletic teams, musical, literary, and military societies, and to deprive them of customary graduation honors.

(August 15, 1906.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in a proceeding to enjoin defendants from depriving plaintiff's minor son of certain school privileges. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The board cannot exclude from school any but those named in the statute.

Mere membership in a Greek fraternity

Case Note.—Forbidding student's affiliation with secret society:—The only other case in which the question of the right of school authorities to exclude pupils from educational institutions supported by the state, because of their connection with secret societies, appears to have been raised, is that of State ex rel. Stallard v. White, 82 Ind. 278, 42 Am. Rep. 496, in which the right of the board of trustees and faculty of Purdue university, which is the Indiana state agricultural college, to make membership in a Greek-letter fraternity a disqualification for admission as a student to the university, was denied, and where an applicant who was refused admission because of his refusal to sign a pledge to disconnect himself as an active member from such society during his connection with the university was held to be entitled to mandamus to compel his admission. The court said that, since the university was an institution of learning primarily endowed by Congress, and continued in existence very largely by appropriations made by the general assembly of the state, it was therefore an educational institution sustaining relations to the people at large analogous to those occupied by other public schools and colleges of the state maintained at public expense, and one in which all inhabitants of the state had a common interest; that the general principles underlying the educational principles of the state were consequently applicable to the governmental control of the university; and it distinguished the case of People ex rel. Pratt v. Wheaton College, 40 Ill. 186, where the rule does not disqualify one for admission as a student in a public school.

of an incorporated college forbidding students to become members of secret societies was held not to be unreasonable, and to be clearly within the power of the college authorities to make and enforce, on the ground that Wheaton college was an institution resting on private endowment and deriving no aid whatever from taxation or other public source, and also on the ground that the regulation in that case had reference to the government and control of students after they had been admitted to the institution. The court said it was clearly within the power of the trustees absolutely to prohibit any connection between the Greek fraternities and the university; that they also had the undoubted authority to prohibit the attendance of students upon the meetings of such Greek fraternities, or from having any other active connection with such societies, so long as the students remained under the control of the university, whenever such attendance upon the meetings of, or other active connection with, such fraternities might tend in any material degree to interfere with the proper relations of the students to the university; but that the possession of this great power over a student after he had entered the university did not justify, as a condition of admission into the university, anything which might be construed as an invidious discrimination against a student on account of his previous membership in any one of the Greek fraternities; adding: "If mere membership in any of the so-called Greek fraternities may be treated as a disqualification for admission as a student in a public school, then membership in any other secret or similar society may be converted into a like disqualification, and in this way discriminations might be made against large classes of the 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

inhabitants of the state in utter disregard of the fundamental ideas upon which our entire educational system is based. Membership in an inherently immoral society or fraternity might, perhaps, be urged against the admissibility of a student, upon the ground that such relation to such a society or fraternity tended to establish a want of moral character or moral fitness in the applicant." One judge in this case dissented on the ground that, although the rule of the university in question, taken literally, might be deemed to be an unwarranted effort to interfere with the freedom of those who became students to have any connection whatever with the Greek fraternities from the time of admission until their final departure, though they formed such connections elsewhere and in such a way as not to affect their conduct as students, yet, when properly construed, it had reference simply to the conduct of students as such while in attendance, and not when, in vacation or other times, they might be absent from college, beyond the limits of supervision by the faculty, and under the authority or admonition of their parents or guardians; and that the faculty so understood it, as shown by the pledge tendered to the student in this case, whereby he was required, not to sever his connection, but only to cease active membership in the society which he had joined. This judge also said that the distinction made between the right to attach conditions to the admission of students and the right to make rules and regulations for their government after admission seemed to him unsubstantial and immaterial.

The general question of the power of school authorities over pupils while outside of school grounds is considered in a case note in 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 496.

Jefferson City School Board, 71 Mo. 628, 36 Am. Rep. 499; Deskins v. Gose, supra.

Crow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced by appellant against the board of school directors of school district No. 1 in Seattle, King county, Washington, and other school authorities of said district, to restrain them from enforcing certain rules which deprive members of Greek-letter fraternities of the privileges of said high school, except that of attending classes. The appellant, George Wayland, a minor eighteen years of age, sues by Russell Wayland, his guardian ad litem, on behalf of himself and other members of the Gamma Eta Kappa fraternity. He alleges that all members of said fraternity are of school age and entitled to all the privileges of said high school; that they are unjustly prohibited from belonging to debating clubs, athletic teams, school bands, glee clubs, orchestras, cadet corps, and other kindred organizations of said school, and that, unless they withdraw from said fraternity, they will also be deprived of the customary honors attending graduation; that they have no privileges except that of attending classes; that said rules are in excess of lawful authority; that there is nothing objectionable in said fraternity; that its meetings are held at the homes of members, with the consent of their parents, every two weeks, from 8 to 10 o'clock P. M., and never during school hours; that they are not under the jurisdiction of the school authorities, but are under parental control; that at said meetings improper conduct is prohibited, and that a high-class literary program is carried out. The answer pleaded an affirmative defense, substantially alleging the facts afterwards found by the trial court. From a final judgment refusing injunctive relief, this appeal has been taken.

The trial court made findings of fact, from which it appears that at the time of the commencement of this action George Wayland was a student in the Seattle high school, and also a member of a certain secret Greek-letter society, known as the "Gamma Eta Kappa fraternity;" that the membership in said fraternity and in other similar high-school secret societies was confined particularly to high-school students; that such societies were therefore usually known as high-school fraternities; that members other than such students were admitted as honorary members only; that said Gamma Eta Kappa fraternity was first organized in Seattle during the year 1900, at which time a request was made by it for the use of the name of said Seattle high school; that, before acting on said request, the high-school authorities instituted a careful investigation to ascertain the probable effect of such societies on the school; that after such investigation, and after receiving reports from many prominent educators, all of whom unqualifiedly condemned the influence of said societies as highly deleterious and injurious, the school board of said Seattle district, on May 7, 1901, passed a resolution whereby said request for the use of the name of the Seattle high school in connection with said fraternity was refused, and membership of students in any secret society connected with said school forbidden; that at all times thereafter it was contrary to the rules and regulations of said high school for pupils to become members of the said fraternities; that afterwards said George Wayland, while a student in said school, became a member of said Gamma Eta Kappa fraternity as did other students; that it was also contrary to the said rules and regulations for students to become pledged to said secret societies; that said rules and regulations were from time to time modified to meet emergencies in accordance with the activities of said societies in pledging or initiating members; that on May 5, 1905, the school board, by final action, amended its former rules so as to provide that all students who were then members of any high-school secret society, or pledged to become such, who would promise that, so long as they remained students of said high school, they would not become members of any other such secret society, or give any promise or pledge to become such, or solicit any other student to give any promise or pledge to become a member of any high-school fraternity or secret society, and in good faith kept such promise,—such students would be restored to the privileges of such school; otherwise all students who thereafter should become members of, or in any way pledge or bind themselves to join, any high-school fraternity or secret society, or should initiate or pledge any other students, or in any way encourage or foster the fraternity spirit in the high school, should be denied all the privileges of the high school except those of the class room; that the influence of the said Gamma Eta Kappa fraternity and similar secret societies, and the membership and pledging of students therein, permeating said school, injuriously affected the good order and discipline thereof; that, in adopting the various rules and regulations aforesaid, and in denying certain privileges of said school to pupils who refused to comply therewith, the respondents at all times acted in good faith and in the exercise of an honest judgment; that such action was at all times general in its application, and at no time special, malicious, or arbitrary; and that all such rules and regulations, and particularly those in force and effect at the time of the institution of this suit, were reasonable and necessary, and were wholly within the powers of the respondents.

It will be observed that no attempt is being made by the respondents to deny appellant any instruction afforded by class work, or by the required curriculum of the school. He is only denied certain other privileges, such as participation in athletic, literary, military, musical, or class organizations. In other words, the respondents made it optional with appellant to determine whether, against the known wishes of the school authorities, he would continue his membership in said secret society, and thereby forfeit participation in the privileges above mentioned, which were no part of the class work or curriculum, or whether, by complying with the adopted rules, he would elect to enjoy the privileges of which he is now deprived. The appellant contends that the trial court erred (1) in making certain of the above findings of fact to which he has excepted; and (2) in entering judgment dismissing his complaint. Appellant especially complains that the evidence does not sustain the finding that all active members of the Gamma Eta Kappa fraternity were high-school students, and that any members not students were honorary members only. There may have been an instance in which an active member was not a student when initiated, but he had been a student immediately prior thereto, and there is no evidence that he did not intend to so continue. In any event, it is immaterial whether he, or even other members, were students. It clearly appears that the fundamental purpose was to organize with students of the Seattle high school. The evidence shows that this particular Gamma Eta Kappa fraternity is a branch or chapter of a general organization having other chapters in various high schools throughout the country; that it is subordinate to a general or parent governing body, and that the entire organization is essentially a confederation of associations composed in the main of high-school students. We call attention to a certain periodical which, with the consent of both appellant and respondents, was admitted in evidence, and is entitled: "The Gamma Eta Kappa Magazine, Quarterly Devoted to the Interest of the Gamma Eta Kappa Fraternity of the United States of America, and Published by the Grand Conclave." This magazine appears to be in the charge of one general editor located in San Francisco, assisted by chapter editors, members of twenty distinct chapters including Rho Gamma chapter, the one of which appellant is a member, purporting to be connected with the Seattle high school. In this magazine we find the following editorial: "In former editorials we have frequently dwelt upon our old stand-by the high-school fraternities versus school boards and principals, but we feel compelled to again state the facts, on account of recent developments. The principal of the Seattle high school does not know what a fraternity is, or he would not attempt to enforce his proposed futile plans. It is simply a case of all educators not educated. Imagine the monarch that could prohibit a man from wearing a fraternity pin. The Sacramento board of education by a vote of 6 to 3 recently decided 'to forbid any member of the Sacramento high school from joining a frat society in that school.' There is no penalty affixed, and the resolution was simply adopted to quell public sentiment in order to secure a favorable vote from the people on new school bonds. In voting on this motion but one member of the board expressed the belief that the law would uphold them in attempting to crush a society in a public institution; in other words they are educated. We hope that others will learn and save us the trouble of summoning our army of able attorneys, who are willing to defend us in the courts, and in doing so will make these uneducated beings feel their lack of knowledge with humiliation and chagrin at the expense of the poor unfortunates."

This magazine also publishes a letter from the Rho Gamma or Seattle chapter, in which the existing differences between it and the Seattle high-school authorities are discussed. This letter in part says: "And now comes the most unkindest cut of all. Beginning with the coming school year, in addition to the restrictions already imposed, all members of fraternities and sororities will be denied the right of graduation or of representing the school in any field of effort or competition. This is according to an open letter from Supt. Cooper to Prof. Twitmeyer. He calls Mr. Twitmeyer's attention to a recent ruling of the board which authorizes his action. According to the ruling, the superintendent is given authority to 'repeal all existing regulations.' This phrase may or may not be significant, for, as far as the secret societies are concerned, they will go ahead and prosper as before. There will be no difficulty in pledging and initiating new members as they may be desired, because, far from creating any dismay among the students, it has aroused a feeling of indignation and that natural antipathy to restriction which is inherent in the American youth. . . . It is barely possible that Rho Gamma chapter will incorporate, but it is a question whether such action would help matters any, or would only add fuel to the flame." Letters from the Sacramento, California, and Denver, Colorado, chapters are also published, showing a like spirit of insubordination against lawful school authority. We incorporate these quotations in this opinion to illustrate the seditious spirit permeating this organization, with which the school authorities were obliged to deal. Without further discussion of the evidence, we express our complete satisfaction with each and all of the findings made by the honorable trial court.

The only remaining question is whether the board of education had authority to adopt the rules complained of. Appellant insists that § 2334, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, provides who shall be admitted to the public schools, and that the board of education cannot exclude any pupils so entitled to attend. No issue need be taken with this contention. The board has not excluded the appellant from the Seattle high school, neither has it threatened to expel or suspend him. He can and does attend school, and, under our construction of the rules adopted, he is at the same time permitted to continue his membership in the Gamma Eta Kappa fraternity, although in doing so he opposes the authority of the board and thereby forfeits certain privileges which are no necessary part of the curriculum or class work from which he is not excluded. Respondents are only seeking to prevent appellant and his associates from dictating the terms on which they shall enjoy certain privileges which are merely incidental to the regular school work, and this they have authority to do. Appellant further contends that, as the fraternities meet out of school hours at the homes of members, and at no time in the school building, and as their parents consent to this action, the board is exceeding its lawful authority in entering their homes, in withdrawing from parents the control of their children, and in dictating what the children shall or shall not do out of school hours. We think this contention unreasonable. The board has not invaded the homes of any pupils, nor have they sought to interfere with parental custody and control. They have not said these fraternities shall not meet at the various homes, nor have they attempted to control students out of school hours. The evidence shows beyond a doubt that these secret organizations when effected foster a clannish spirit of insubordination, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) which results in much evil to the good order, harmony, discipline, and general welfare of the school. We can express these conditions in no better terms than by quoting from the testimony of Professor Geiger, the principal of the high school, who says: "I have found that membership in a fraternity has tended to lower the scholarship of the fraternity members, . . . the general impression that one gets in dealing with them is one of less respect and obedience to teachers. It is found that there is a tendency toward the snobbish and patronizing air, not only toward the pupils, but toward the teachers; there is a certain contempt for school authority. This is in a measure, I think, aggravated by the attitude of the parent organization, which seems to encourage members of the fraternity in this contempt for school authority; and one of the most difficult things in dealing with the situation is the fact that the members have this allegiance to a general organization or headquarters, which are often located in a distant city, and which it is difficult to reach, and which exercises upon the members in the local school a very powerful influence. . . . In dealing with these fraternity members, I have been assured more than once that they considered their obligation to their fraternity greater than that to the school." The evidence of this witness with that of the president of the school board and other school authorities overwhelmingly establishes the fact that such fraternities do have a marked influence on the school, tending to destroy good order, discipline, and scholarship. This being true, the board is authorized, and it is its duty, to take such reasonable and appropriate action by the adoption of rules as will result in preventing these influences. Such authority is granted by § 2339 and subdivisions 5 and 6 of § 2362, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes. It would be difficult to confer a broader discretionary power than that conferred by these sections. Manifestly it was the intention of the legislature that the management and control of school affairs should be left entirely to the discretion of the board itself, and not to the judicial determination of any court. These powers have been properly and legally conferred upon the board, and, unless it arbitrarily exceeds its authority, which it has not done here, the courts cannot interfere with its action. Kinzer v. Toms (Iowa) 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 496, 105 N. W. 686; Board of Education v. Booth, 110 Ky. 807, 53 L.R.A. 787, 62 S. W. 872; Watson v. Cambridge, 157 Mass. 561, 32 N. E. 864.

The appellant has cited a number of cases which in effect decide that the school board would have no authority to refuse him admission to the high school. This the board has not attempted to do; hence these citations are not in point. The only case mentioned by appellant which seems to be cognate to the questions here involved is that of State ex rel. Stallard v. White, 82 Ind. 278, 42 Am. Rep. 496, in which the supreme court of Indiana held that the officers and trustees of Purdue university, an institution controlled and supported by the state, could not require an applicant, otherwise qualified, to sign a pledge relative to membership in Greek fraternities, as a condition precedent to his admission as a student. The university authorities had adopted a rule that no student should be permitted to join or be connected with any so-called Greek or other college secret society, and, as a condition of admission to the university, or promotion therein, should be required to give a written pledge to observe such regulation. The relator declined to sign such a pledge, and was refused admission as a student for that reason only. The decision which ordered his admission was by a divided court. The majority opinion, however, is not in point as supporting appellant's contention. The appellant has not been refused admission to the high school. The school authorities have only endeavored to exercise a governmental control over him after his admission, without even attempting to suspend him. In the majority opinion in State ex rel. Stallard v. White, supra, the court said: "The admission of students in a public educational institution is one thing, and the government and control of students after they are admitted, and have become subject to the jurisdiction of the institution, is quite another thing. . . . It is clearly within the power of the trustees, and of the faculty when acting presumably, or otherwise, in their behalf, to absolutely prohibit any connection between the Greek fraternities and the university. The trustees have also the undoubted authority to prohibit the attendance of students upon the meetings of such Greek fraternities, or from having any other active connection with such organizations, so long as such students remain under the control of the university, whenever such attendance upon the meetings of, or other active connection with, such fraternities tends in any material degree to interfere with the proper relations of students to the university." The above language shows that the Indiana case upon which the appellant relies utterly fails to sustain any of his contentions. Our attention has not been called to any adjudicated case at all similar to this. Citation to authority, however, is unnecessary, as, under our statutes, the respondent school board had undoubted authority to take the action of which appellant complains, and the courts should not interfere with said board in the enforcement of the rules and regulations which it has adopted. The judgment is affirmed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Case Note.—Right of appellate court to set aside finding of jury upon the ground that it is contrary to scientific principles:

—A diligent search has failed to disclose any cases in which the question suggested in the title has been discussed. Assuming the power of an appellate court to set aside a verdict upon the ground that it is contrary to all the reasonable inferences which the evidence, considered as a whole, permits, it may be conceded that, under some possible circumstances, at least, such right may properly be exercised upon the ground that the verdict, even though nominally supported by the evidence of eyewitnesses, is contrary to nature's indisputable laws. It must be borne in mind, however, in the first place, that there is no presumption that the members of the appellate court are any better informed than the members of the jury which returned the verdict as to the working of the laws of nature. A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Appeal from the circuit court for Milwaukee county. Action to recover for personal injuries. Plaintiff complained that while in the employ of defendant the latter failed to furnish him a reasonably safe place in which to do his work, in that his working place was in close proximity to a steam hammer so defective that it was liable to deliver two blows when only one was intended and without any manipulation of the controlling levers for the second strike, and thereby cause the drift pin, used on the occasion in question, if moved out of its place or turned over by the first blow, to fly from its location under the hammer with great force, and to injure any person who might be within its range; that plaintiff was injured in that way, his right leg being fractured above the knee. Judgment was asked in the sum of $10,000. Defendant answered putting in issue all allegations in respect to the hammer being defective.

During the impaneling of the jury plaintiff asked defendant's counsel if a certain insurance company was not pecuniarily interested in the litigation. The latter objected to being so interrogated in the presence of the jury, and still further objected to being interrogated at all in his place as defendant's representative, and compelled to answer the questions. He was then called to the stand as a witness, and sworn. The question was then repeated to him, and, under protest, by order of the court, he was compelled to answer, which he did in the affirmative.

The mechanism which it was claimed caused the injury consisted of a hammer weighing about 1,250 pounds, a piston rod, piston head, and cylinder set in a vertical position with such connections that by a proper manipulation thereof the hammer could be caused to drop, striking whatever was on the hammer bed with its own weight accelerated by a steam pressure of from 70 to 90 pounds to the square inch and to rise again to its position and repeat the blow as often as desired, but only by manipulation of the operating lever. There were two levers. One was to control the steam as to turning it on or off from the boiler, and the other to control the application of the steam as to applying it below the piston head to raise the hammer, exhaust it to permit the hammer to fall, and to apply it above the cylinder head to add the force thereof to the gravity power of the falling weight.

There was no way by which the hammer could be raised to deliver a blow, except by drawing the steam lever and raising the operating lever. There was no way by which a blow could be delivered except by putting down the operating lever. If a blow was desired combining the falling weight of the hammer and the steam pressure also, that was accomplished by pressing down the operating lever while the steam was on. If abstract, such a court might well hesitate to overturn, upon the ground that it is contrary to scientific principles, a verdict sustained by the testimony of apparently disinterested eyewitnesses purporting to state what they actually saw, for the reason that there may have been some fact or circumstance not apparent from the record, or, perhaps, not shown even on the trial, that, if shown, would have reconciled the testimony of the eyewitnesses with the scientific principles applicable to the subject. To set aside a verdict sustained by the testimony of apparently disinterested eyewitnesses whom the jury have credited involves, first, the assumption of the correctness of the appellate court's understanding of the scientific principles applicable to the facts as shown by the record, and, secondly, the assumption that all the facts which could affect the question are before the court. Ordinarily, of course, an appellate court is entitled to base its decision upon the showing made by the record; but, if the court undertakes to go outside the record and test the verdict by reference to scientific principles, it would seem that it cannot properly close its eyes to the possibility that there may have been a fact or circumstance, not disclosed by the record, which would reconcile the testimony of the eyewitnesses with scientific principles,—at least, unless the facts and circumstances as shown by the record are such as reasonably to repel the existence of any other fact or circumstance which could affect the matter.

a blow was only desired of the falling weight of the hammer, that was accomplished by shutting off the steam and putting the operating lever down. There was no automatic shutting off or on of the steam, or turning in of the steam above or below the piston head. Every movement of the hammer was positive, following the appropriate movements of the operating lever and steam lever.

The evidence, in the main, was directed to the point of whether on the occasion in question the hammer struck two blows when only one was desired, or, in other words, whether, the appliance being manipulated to strike one blow, two blows were delivered without any movement of the levers. There was evidence for the plaintiff by the boy who operated the levers on the occasion in question, and who had operated them for weeks prior thereto, that the hammer was accustomed to strike two blows when only one was desired, and to deliver the second blow without any change in the controlling lever; that he made complaint on several occasions to the boss of the department, who promised to fix the machine. He testified that, if the levers did their work properly, the machine could not work that way. He attributed the second blow of the hammer to some defect in the machine, but suggested no particular defect, and suggested no cause whatever except a leak of steam. There was other testimony on the part of plaintiff to the effect that a second blow might be caused when only one was desired by water in the cylinder, or by a leak of steam around the piston head where it entered the cylinder. The evidence on the part of defendant was to this effect: The hammer worked perfectly prior to the occurrence in question and thereafter. It was an utter impossibility for such a hammer to rebound after striking a blow and strike a second blow as testified to by plaintiff's witness; that such a movement would render the hammer worse than useless. The hammer could only be raised by turning on the steam and raising the operating lever letting steam in below the piston head. So long as the operating lever remained up and the steam on, it was an utter impossibility for the hammer to fall because the full pressure of the steam in the boiler would extend to the cylinder head. The cylinder head could not descend, allowing the hammer to drop without compression of the steam and back pressure on the boiler, which was an impossibility, the pressure customarily being 70 to 90 pounds to the square inch. The hammer, after being raised by the steam pressure, could not be made to fall otherwise than by shutting off the steam and dropping the operating lever. No movement of the hammer was possible except in response to proper movements of the levers mentioned, the one designed to turn on and off the steam and the other to apply it.

At the close of the evidence defendant's counsel moved the court to direct a verdict in favor of defendant. The motion was denied. The jury rendered a special verdict, finding, in effect, as follows: The steam hammer was out of repair, causing it to strike two blows when only one was desired, notwithstanding proper manipulation of the controlling levers by the hammer boy. That defective condition of the hammer was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury. The defendant, by the exercise of ordinary care, might have known of such defective condition of the hammer for a sufficient length of time before the accident to have remedied the same. The plaintiff was not guilty of any want of ordinary care contributing to the injury. Three thousand dollars will be required to compensate him for his injury.

After verdict defendant's counsel moved the court to change the finding in respect to the hammer being defective and striking two blows when only one was desired, so as to negative any such condition, and by striking out the finding in respect to the hammer being defective, as claimed by plaintiff, and the defects having existed so long that defendant, by the exercise of ordinary care, might have discovered them a sufficient length of time before the accident to have remedied the same, and to give judgment in its favor of no cause of action. The motion was denied. The court then, on motion, rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for the amount of damages found by the jury.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In Faber v. C. Reiss Coal Co. 124 Wis. 554, 102 N. W. 1049, it was held that a juror may properly be interrogated upon the voir dire as to whether he is in the employ of, or in any way concerned with, any insurance company which is pecuniarily interested in the litigation, the examination being conducted in the presence of jurors already in the box and those not yet drawn, if thought best, and in such reasonable manner as not to place improper matter before them or suggest impropriety in the company's connection with the case. In other words, such examination is proper so long as conducted "strictly within the right" to discover the state of mind of the juror as regards the matter in hand or any collateral matter reasonably liable to unduly influence him. The learned circuit court seems to have considered the conclusion in that case with what was said in support thereof as warranting the extraordinary proceeding detailed in the record. If there is anything in the former case suggesting the propriety of requiring counsel to state either from his place as such or from the stand as a witness, as was done here, whether an insurance company is concerned in the litigation, we are not conscious of it. It would seem that the words in the former case to the effect that the questions propounded must be to the juror and "strictly within the right" as to his status respecting the controversy in hand, by necessary implication, condemn the proceeding under consideration.

The mere fact that an insurance company was concerned in the litigation was wholly immaterial. The attitude of the court as to compelling appellant's counsel to bear evidence in respect thereto, notwithstanding assurance of respondent's counsel that the information sought for was wanted only as a basis for interrogating the jury, clearly gave undue importance to the insurance company's connection with the case, since no such basis was necessary. It was a matter quite likely to prejudice the jury, and should not have been adverted to at all except by questions to the particular juror under examination and "strictly within the right" to discover whether any bias or basis therefor on his part existed. The pretense that it was necessary to interrogate counsel, as was done, to obtain a basis for such discovery, should not have appealed successfully to the court.

All cases, but particularly such as the one in hand, should be managed from the bench with the most scrupulous and constant regard for the existence of those mere ulterior matters liable to be referred to purposely or apparently so, in a way to improperly influence the jury. That is due to the parties, and is due as well to the jurors themselves. They have the single function to perform of determining the truth as to controverted issues of fact solely from the competent evidence produced in their hearing and the law as given to them by the court. When their true position, and that only, is kept before them from the beginning to the end of the trial, and they are inspired by the guiding hand of the judge to win distinction by putting aside every influence except the evidence and the law proper for their consideration, the jury system is commonly vindicated as being the best that has been designed or is designable for the discovery of truth in the administration of justice. The proceeding under consideration was a wide departure from that standard. It was wholly unnecessary to the ostensible purpose thereof. The effort to interrogate counsel, at the very outset, should have been firmly repressed, and the attention of the interrogator directed to the only legitimate subject in hand,—that of determining whether the juror was in any wise concerned in any insurance company interested in the litigation. The discovery in that regard might well have been obtained by one or two proper questions not calculated to unduly suggest the fact of the company's connection with the case.

In addition to the foregoing, the proper solution of the question as to whether the evidence warranted the finding that the steam hammer was defective, and thereby it was caused to make two strokes when only one was intended, producing the injury complained of, so effectually disposes of this appeal, and, under the present practice, in view of the record, of the litigation as well, that it does not seem advisable to discuss any other matter. We will consider such additional matter briefly.

Nature's unchanging and unchangeable laws and the unvarying and invariable principles of mechanics cannot be turned aside by the verdict of a jury, even if the matter concerning the same is given into their hands accompanied by a judicial suggestion that there may be reasonable doubt in respect thereto. This court has often spoken decisively on that subject for the guidance of trial courts, as well as for the purposes of the particular cases in which the matter was involved. Vorbrich v. Geuder & P. Mfg. Co. 96 Wis. 277, 71 N. W. 434; Montayne v. Northern Electrical Mfg. Co. (Wis.) 105 N. W. 1043.

When the evidence in relation to a controverted question of fact on the one side accords with what must necessarily have been the case under given undisputed and indisputable circumstances, and the evidence on the other side is opposed thereto, obviously there is no room for conflicting reasonable inferences, consequently no question for solution by a jury. Whether such situation does or does not exist in any case is a matter for the court to determine. It cannot escape the responsibility of solving it and doing so considerably. Such a situation often presents the most severe test of judicial courage which trial courts are subjected to. Failure to satisfy such test in all respects gives ground, unjustly it seems, for much of the criticism often heard of the jury system. The duty devolves upon the presiding judge, in every jury trial, before giving the controversy over to the jury for a determination, of deciding whether, under the evidence and the law applicable thereto, there can fairly be said to be reasonable inferences favoring one side, as well as such inferences favoring the other; so that the truth of the matter may be with the former or with the latter. It is easy to see that in case of a decision in the affirmative, when the conclusion clearly should be in the negative, the jury must naturally regard such decision as suggesting that their function as to determining a conflict between reasonable inferences is necessarily called into action. They take the case, in such circumstances, at the hands of the court accompanied by a decision, in advance by paramount authority, that the evidence, in view of the law applicable thereto, will sustain a verdict either way according as the same may be viewed by them. Upon their going wrong, harsh criticism thereof and of the jury system itself, is quite out of place. The fault is not with the system, but with its administration. Musbach v. Wisconsin Chair Co. 108 Wis. 57-59, 84 N. W. 36.

Where the evidence is sufficient only to give rise to mere conjecture in favor of the plaintiff, or to suggest merely a possibility of the truth being as claimed by him (Hyer v. Janesville, 101 Wis. 371, 77 N. W. 729; Sorenson v. Menasha Paper & Pulp Co. 56 Wis. 338, 14 N. W. 446; Agen v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 105 Wis. 217-225, 76 Am. St. Rep. 905, 80 N. W. 1020; Spencer v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 105 Wis. 311, 81 N. W. 407; Stafford v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co. 110 Wis. 331-345, 85 N. W. 1036); or the evidence in his favor is contrary to all reasonable probabilities,—the jury are placed in a false position by being directed to determine upon which side are the major and controlling probabilities. The court in such circumstances, without a motion in that regard, should apply the law thereto and dispose of the litigation accordingly. Refusal in that regard, in face of a proper motion invoking judicial action, is no less than the denial of a right. Finkelston v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 94 Wis. 270, 68 N. W. 1005; Cawley v. La Crosse City R. Co. 101 Wis. 145, 77 N. W. 179; Baxter v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 104 Wis. 307-330, 80 N. W. 644; Optenberg v. Skelton, 109 Wis. 241, 85 N. W. 356. We are not unmindful that error now and then in respect to such matters is consistent with the most careful judicial administration. What has been said has reference particularly to those extreme cases, of which this is one, which are too plain to admit of any reasonable controversy.

It requires but the most ordinary appreciation of the operation of a machine—combining a block of steel, weighing 1,250 pounds, more or less, for use as a hammer, suspended above an anvil bed by a piston rod having its upper end armed with a piston head inclosed in a cylinder in the ordinary way for utilizing the power of steam under compression, the whole appliance being erected in a vertical position with connections so as to permit of the piston head being made to oscillate only by the necessary valves controlling the application of steam being operated by hand power as to each movement of the piston, as in this case; that is, such appliance not having any automatic device to cause the movement of the piston head in one direction to reverse the application of the steam pressure so as to produce a return motion—to perceive that a stroke of the hammer without the appropriate precedent movement of the controlling device is out of the question. It seems perfectly obvious that every movement of the piston head must necessarily be preceded by such appropriate shifting of the controlling device by the person in charge thereof. It follows that these must be regarded as verities respecting the case in hand: When the hammer boy, as the one attending the machine was called, turned on the steam and raised the controlling lever so as to open the inlet below the piston head and the exhaust above, the hammer necessarily was elevated to a position of readiness for a strike. It could not go back against the steam pressure. It necessarily remained in the position of readiness for a strike, the steam pressure being continued, till the controlling lever was put down opening the exhaust below the cylinder head. After a blow was struck the hammer could not rebound against steam pressure applied above the piston head to accelerate the downward motion, in case of such acceleration. In case of the steam being shut off instantly upon the blow being delivered there could yet be no return motion to a position requisite for a second strike. The hammer would necessarily remain down by its own weight and by the steam pressure above the piston head as well till such pressure was reduced by condensation. The hammer could not go back for a second strike except in response to a reverse motion of the controlling device, opening the exhaust above the cylinder head and the inlet below. The testimony of a witness to the contrary of this only evidenced ignorance or something worse. Any amount of such contrary evidence could not raise any conflict for solution by a jury. Reasonable doubt respecting the truth of a matter arrived at by methods of positive demonstration cannot be created by any amount of mere speculation or conjecture, or even positive contrary evidence from the mouths of witnesses.

Proof that the machine worked perfectly both before and after the accident, which was very satisfactorily made, cast the burden on plaintiff to show that the alleged second strike of the hammer, if one occurred, was caused by a defect in the appliance. In this we put aside the evidence as to the double and uncontrollable action of the hammer as not worthy of belief. In any event it was efficiently rebutted, so far as such double motion of the hammer suggesting that it was the result of any defect in the machine. Vorbrich v. Geuder & P. Mfg. Co. supra. There was no attempt to lift the burden thus cast on respondent, except by proof that the alleged second motion of the hammer might have been caused by a leak of steam at the entrance of the piston rod into the cylinder, or by water in the cylinder. There was no proof of a definite character that any such leak existed, or that there was water in the cylinder. Moreover, it is readily seen that if there were such a leak it could not possibly have caused the alleged undesired motion of the hammer.

The entrance of the piston rod into the cylinder was below the piston head. Such a leak could not have been active except when the hammer was up and the steam pressure was on, and then the effect could only have been a mere waste of energy of a trifling character, necessarily supplied as fast as it occurred in case the steam was on, and otherwise it could only have permitted of a slow descent of the hammer as the steam escaped. In no event could it have caused the cylinder head to rise, lifting the hammer, or have caused any efficient motion of the hammer whatever. The suggestion of water in the cylinder is likewise hardly worthy of consideration. Water in the cylinder below the piston head, in case of any accumulation thereof at that point, would necessarily be forced out by the downward motion of the piston head. Water could have accumulated above the cylinder head only by condensation of the steam which caused the downward motion or a leaky valve, and such accumulation, if one occurred, could not in any event have caused a reverse motion, or any motion, of the hammer. Neither of the suggested explanations of the alleged double motion of the hammer was supported by anything better than baseless conjecture, as it seems to us. This is in accordance with the evidence, and is self-evident.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to grant the motion made in appellant's behalf for a correction of the verdict and for judgment in his favor dismissing the action with costs.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

ALEXANDER KLUG, Appt.,
v.

GEORGE D. SHERIFFS, Respt.

(— Wis. —, 109 N. W. 656.)

Portrait—contract to paint—breach.

An artist who, after filling an order to paint a portrait from photographs of the deceased wife of his customer, proceeds without orders to paint another, cannot compel the customer to pay for it if it is placed in his possession for inspection and retained by him, since the act of painting it constitutes a violation of the contract and breach of trust.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Milwaukee County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the value of a portrait alleged to have been painted by plaintiff for defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the circuit court of Milwaukee county dismissing the plaintiff's complaint. The plaintiff an artist, contracted with defendant to paint a portrait of his deceased wife, and for such purpose, at plaintiff's request, defendant furnished two photographs, one taken indoors; and the other, a group photograph, taken out of doors, in which she appeared with others. The photographs were furnished for the purpose of aiding plaintiff in the work. It was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that a portrait should be painted from the "outing" photograph for $175, which was done, and the portrait delivered and paid for. A few days after defendant received the portrait, plaintiff wrote him that, without any direction, he had painted a portrait of his deceased wife from the "indoor" photograph, and asked whether defendant desired to see it. Defendant, by letter, requested that the second portrait be brought to his house, which was done. The painting was never returned or paid for. This action was brought to recover for goods sold and delivered of the alleged value of $190. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the court found "that, without any authority, contract, or permission from said defendant, said plaintiff painted and prepared a second portrait of defendant's deceased wife from the aforesaid photographs, while the same were still in his possession. That after said plaintiff had delivered the first portrait to said defendant, and had received the agreed price therefor, he, the said plaintiff, notified said defendant that he had painted a second portrait of defendant's deceased wife from said photographs, and inquired whether said defendant desired to courts, the few cases which have considered it clearly sustain the principle upon which the decision in KLUG v. SHERIFFS rests. These cases hold that an artist, or a photographer, who contracts, for a compensation, to make a portrait for another person, has no right to print copies therefrom for his personal use or profit. The chief ground upon which this doctrine is based is that of implied contract, though it has also been held that such an act on the part of the person contracting to make the picture constitutes a violation of confidence.

The case of KLUG v. SHERIFFS, however, seems to be the only case in which one engaged to make a portrait has attempted to compel the person for whom it is made to pay for a duplicate made without authority.

In Pollard v. Photographic Co. L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 345, 60 L. T. N. S. 418, it was held that a photographer who takes a negative likeness of a lady to supply her with copies for money will be restrained from selling or exhibiting copies thereof, on the ground that there is an implied contract not to use the negative for such purpose, and also on the ground that such sale or exhibition is a breach of confidence.

Again, in Moore v. Rugg, 44 Minn. 28, 9 L.R.A. 58, 20 Am. St. Rep. 539, 46 N. W. 141, it is held that a photographer employed to make and furnish a party with a certain number of photographs of herself has no right to print and dispose of any copies without the consent of the person so employing the photographer, on the ground that the contract between the subject and the photographer implies that the negative shall not be used for any other purpose.

So, in Corliss v. E. W. Walker Co. 31 L.R.A. 283, 64 Fed. 280, 57 Fed. 434, there is a dictum to the effect that, when a person engages a photographer to take his picture, agreeing to pay so much for the copies which he desires, the transaction assumes the form of a contract; and it is a breach of contract, as well as a violation of confidence, for the photographer to make additional copies from the negatives.

Another dictum to the same effect is found in Press Pub. Co. v. Falk, 59 Fed. 324, where the court says: "When a person has a negative taken and photographs made for pay in the usual course, the work is done for the person so procuring it to be done, and the negative, so far as it is a picture or capable of producing pictures of that person, and all photographs so made from it, belong to that person, and neither the artists, nor anyone else, has any right to make pictures from the negative, or to copy the photographs, if not otherwise published, for anyone else;" citing Pollard v. Photographic Co. and Moore v. Rugg, supra.

And in Dielman v. White, 102 Fed. 892, the court says: "If a patron gives a commission to an artist, there appears to me a very strong implication that the work of art commissioned is to belong unreservedly and without limitation to the patron. It is not necessary to decide if the artist retains the right to make for another a replica. Reproduction by the artist may be a question of artistic ethics, rather than of law." But in this case the work of art ordered was not a portrait, and the question involved was the right of the patron to permit reproductions thereof.

Again, in a similar case, it was said that, if the sale and delivery of a picture by the artist who painted it is absolute and unconditional, the whole property passes to the purchaser, including the right of publication. Parton v. Prang, 3 Cliff. 537, Fed. Cas. No. 10,784.

In Boyd v. Dagenis, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 11

see said second portrait, to which inquiry said defendant replied, and instructed said plaintiff to bring said second portrait to his house; and, in response to said suggestion so made by said defendant, the plaintiff brought said second portrait to the house of defendant, and, upon inquiry as to the price of said second portrait, stated that the same would be one hundred and seventy-five ($175) dollars, which price said defendant refused to pay him therefor, and also refused to surrender to him, the said plaintiff, the said portrait, for the reason that said plaintiff had received no instruction, authority, or direction to paint same, and the defendant then and there offered to destroy said portrait, which said plaintiff refused to have done. That at the time of the delivery of said portrait, as aforesaid, said defendant offered to have the picture removed from the frame, which said plaintiff had placed thereon; and, prior to the commencement of this action, the defendant offered and tendered to said plaintiff the frame in which said picture was set, and the plaintiff refused same, and still refuses same; that said defendant has ever since said day held himself in position, and has been ready and willing, to return said frame, but said plaintiff refused, and still refuses, to receive the same. That said plaintiff had no authority to paint said second portrait from the photographs in his possession, thus received for the purpose of painting said first portrait, and that the doing of the same was a breach of faith on the part of said plaintiff, and he acquired no property rights or interest in said picture by reason thereof." Judgment dismissing the plaintiff's complaint, with costs, was ordered, from which this appeal was taken.

C. S. 66, it was held, without passing on the merits of the case, that there was no misjoinder of causes of action where two or three persons of whom a photograph had been made brought an action of damages against the photographer for printing and exposing in his window a copy of the photograph, the plaintiffs having paid for and received all the copies that they had ordered.

But the right of a widow, who brought an action against a photographer for selling copies of photographs of her deceased husband, for which she had paid, to recover, was denied in Marsh v. Shackford, 67 N. H. 96, 36 Atl. 607, where she failed to show ownership of the photographs in herself. The court said that, in the absence of an express statement of her ownership, it was to be inferred that her claim was that the title passed to her, as matter of law, when she paid for the photographs, but that this was an incorrect view of the law; that whatever

Mr. J. W. Wegner for respondent.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case are substantially undisputed, and the questions of law are: (1) Whether the painting of the second portrait was an invasion of the so-called "right of privacy;" and (2) whether the painting of the second portrait was a breach of trust, contract, or confidence, and whether the plaintiff acquired any property in the second portrait.

1. Upon the first proposition, as regards the right of privacy, the authorities seem to leave the question in some uncertainty, as to the extent to which courts will go in enforcing the right. In Atkinson v. John E. Doherty & Co. 121 Mich. 372, 46 L.R.A. 219, 80 Am. St. Rep. 507, 80 N. W. 285, it was held that equity will not restrain the use of the name and likeness of a deceased person as a label for a brand of cigars named after him, though offensive to the family of the deceased, so long as it did not amount to a libel. In Schuyler v. Curtis, 147 N. Y. 434, 31 L.R.A. 286, 49 Am. St. Rep. 671, 42 N. E. 22, it was held that the individual right of privacy, which any person has during life, dies with the person, and any right of privacy which survives is a right pertaining to the living only. In this case the plaintiff brought an action to restrain de-

the rights of the husband in the negative may have been, they did not pass as an incident of the photographs to any person who might pay for them.

And where, at the invitation of a photographer, an actress gave him a sitting for her photograph in her public character, he making no charge, and in return for the sitting giving her a number of complimentary copies, it was held in Ellis v. Marshall, 64 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 757, that he had a copyright in the photograph as author; but this case was an action by the photographer to restrain the publication of copies of the photographs by third persons, to whom the subject had given permission to publish such copies.

As to the broader question of use of negative or photograph plates generally, without the consent of the party who has paid for the same, see note in 50 L.R.A. 397.

fendants from making a statue or bust of deceased, Mrs. Schuyler, or from receiving subscriptions for the purpose of defraying the cost of making the same, and also restraining them from using the name of Mrs. Schuyler, or of circulating any description of her in connection with the "Woman's Memorial Fund Association." The action was brought by relatives of Mrs. Schuyler, and it was held that the action could not be maintained; it appearing that the motive of the parties interested in erecting a bust was to do honor to the memory of the deceased. Again, the question was considered by the court of appeals of New York, in Roberson v. Rochester Folding Box Co. 171 N. Y. 538, 59 L.R.A. 478, 89 Am. St. Rep. 828, 64 N. E. 442, Chief Justice Parker writing the opinion, in which he reaches the conclusion, substantially: "An individual's so-called right of privacy, founded upon the claim that he has the right to pass through this world, if he wills, without having his picture published, his business enterprises discussed, his successful experiments written up for the benefit of others, or his eccentricities commented upon either in handbills, circulars, catalogues, periodicals, or newspapers, and, necessarily, that the things which may not be written and published of him must not be spoken of him by his neighbors, whether the comment be favorable or otherwise, does not exist in the law, and is not enforceable in equity. . . . An injunction cannot be granted to restrain the unauthorized publication and distribution of lithographic prints, or copies, of a photograph of a young woman as part of an advertisement of a legitimate manufactured article, where there is no allegation that the picture is libelous in any respect; but, on the contrary, the gravamen of the complaint is that the likeness is so good that it is easily recognized, and that it has been and is used to attract attention to the advertisement upon which it is placed, although the publication has caused her great mental and physical distress, necessitating the employment and attendance of a physician." There is, however, in each of these cases a vigorous dissenting opinion by Justice Gray. The late case of Pavesich v. New England L. Ins. Co. 122 Ga. 199, 69 L.R.A. 101, 106 Am. St. Rep. 104, 50 S. E. 68, by the supreme court of Georgia, approves the doctrine laid down in the dissenting opinion of Justice Gray in the New York cases, and, in a very able and exhaustive opinion reviewing the cases, holds that the right of privacy is a form of property as much as the right of immunity of one's person. Most of the leading cases are collected and discussed in this case. In the opinion the court quotes approvingly the following language from the dissenting opinion of Justice Gray in Roberson v. Rochester Folding Box Co. supra: "The right of privacy, or the right of the individual to be let alone, is a personal right, which is not without judicial recognition. It is the complement of the right to the immunity of one's person. The individual has always been entitled to be protected in the exclusive use and enjoyment of that which is his own. The common law regarded his person and property as inviolate, and he has the absolute right to be let alone. Cooley, Torts, p. 29. The principle is fundamental and essential in organized society that everyone, in exercising a personal right, and in the use of his property, shall respect the rights and properties of others. He must so conduct himself in the enjoyment of the rights and privileges, which belong to him as a member of society, as that he shall prejudice no one in the possession and enjoyment of those which are exclusively his. When, as here, there is an alleged invasion of some personal right or privilege, the absence of exact precedent, and the fact that early commentators upon the common law have no discussion upon the subject, are of no material importance in awarding equitable relief. That the exercise of the preventive power of a court of equity is demanded in a novel case is not a fatal objection." It will be seen, however, upon examination of the cases cited as sustaining the so-called "right of privacy," that many of them turn upon property rights or breach of trust, contract, or confidence. Levy v. Clements, 175 Mass. 376, 50 L.R.A. 397, 56 N. E. 735; Morison v. Moat, 9 Hare, 241; Prince Albert v. Strange, 2 De G. & S. 652; Tuck v. Priest, L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 629; Pollard v. Photographic Co. L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 345; Gee v. Pritchard, 2 Swanst. 402; Woolsey v. Judd, 4 Duer, 379. See also 4 Harvard Law Rev. 193, and 3 Northwestern Law Rev. 1; Corless v. E. W. Walker Co. 31 L.R.A. 283, 57 Fed. 434, 64 Fed. 280.

2. We think the case before us does not turn upon the so-called "right of privacy," but upon contract relations. The plaintiff seeks to recover at law for the alleged value of the picture, upon the ground that he had a property right in it, and that the defendant, by retaining it, became liable as a purchaser. The complaint is to recover for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to the defendant. The plaintiff, under a contract to paint the portrait, received the two photographs for the purpose of aiding him in the painting of the original picture, which he painted, and was paid for in accordance with the contract. He then undertook, without any authority from the defendant, to paint the second portrait; and, as he says in his letter to defendant, "decided to risk having one painted, which I should be pleased to have you see, either at your home or mine, as it suits your convenience." There is no claim that plaintiff ever had authority to paint the second portrait, or that defendant ever assented thereto. Under the contract, plaintiff had no right to hold the photographs or use them for any other purpose than to aid him in painting the original picture. No express authority to use them for any other purpose was given, and none can be implied from the nature of the engagement. When the original picture was painted, plaintiff's contract with defendant was performed, and he had no right to retain the photographs for any other purpose. When he undertook to produce another picture from the indoor photograph, he violated his contract with defendant, and such act amounted to a breach of the trust reposed in him under the contract relation existing between them. In Lévyreau v. Clements, supra, defendant contracted with plaintiff for a certain number of cuts from defendant's dies to be used by defendant in his business. The plaintiff, in addition to the number of cuts contracted for by defendant, printed a certain number extra for his own use without the knowledge of defendant. By mistake, the extra cuts or folders were delivered, with the others, to defendant, which was immediately discovered, and demand made upon defendant for them, which was refused. Defendant kept the extra cuts not ordered, and used them the same as the others. In an action of trover, the lower court ruled plaintiff could recover, and the judgment was reversed upon appeal. The court said (page 379 of 175 Mass., page 400 of 50 L.R.A., and page 736 of 56 N. E.): "The plaintiff had no right to use the dies to have impressions of them printed for his own use, and his use of them in having 80 extra copies of the folder struck off for himself, for the purpose of advertising his own business of making dies, was a breach of trust toward the defendant, which would have entitled the latter to have, at least, if the matter were of sufficient consequence, an injunction to restrain the plaintiff from using the folders thus wrongfully obtained, and to a decree ordering them to be destroyed." In Tuck v. Priester, supra, the plaintiffs employed defendant, who was a printer in Berlin, to make for them copies of drawings. Defendant made the copies ordered, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

and also, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiffs, made other copies, and exported them to England. It was held that there was an implied contract that defendant should not make any copies of the drawing other than those ordered by plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction and damages by reason of the defendant's breach of contract. In Pollard v. Photographic Co. supra, a photographer who had taken a negative likeness under agreement to supply the person with copies was restrained from selling or exhibiting copies, on the ground that there was an implied contract not to use the negative for such purpose; and, further, because such sale or exhibition was a breach of confidence. In Prince Albert v. Strange, 2 De G. & S. 652, it was held that, where a workman intrusted with copperplates for the purpose of taking impressions for the plaintiff of etchings made by the latter, and not intended for publication, took impressions for himself in violation of the trust, and sold the impressions to the defendant, who published a catalogue of them, accompanied by remarks of his own, the plaintiff was entitled at hearing to a perpetual injunction to restrain the publication of the catalogue, and to a decree ordering the impressions to be destroyed. We think the doctrine of the above cases rules the case before us, and that plaintiff had no right to paint the second picture or use the photographs for such purpose. The plaintiff, being guilty for a breach of contract, and of trust and confidence as well in painting the second portrait, could acquire no property in it, and therefore had none to sell to defendant or anyone else.

It follows that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Dodge, J., dissenting:

No rule is more elementary than that one who knowingly accepts and avails himself of services, performed by another is bound by implied promise to pay for such services although neither requested nor authorized in advance. Wheeler v. Hall, 41 Wis. 447, 451; Wellauer v. Fellows, 48 Wis. 105, 4 N. W. 114; Goodland v. LeClair, 78 Wis. 176, 47 N. W. 268; Williams v. Williams, 114 Wis. 79, 84, 89 N. W. 835; Manitowoc Steam Boiler Works v. Manitowoc Glue Co. 120 Wis. 1, 8, 97 N. W. 515; Indiana Mfg. Co. v. Hayes, 155 Pa. 160, 26 Atl. 6; Bartholomae v. Paull, 18 W. Va. 771; Ford v. Ward, 26 Ark. 363; Abbot v. Third School District, 7 Me. 118. Here the plaintiff painted the picture in question, knowing that defendant would not thereby be placed under any liability, but would have the right after its completion to avail himself of the service or reject it. At defendant's request it was placed in his possession to enable him to decide whether he would reject or would accept it, with complete understanding that plaintiff expected payment in the latter event. Defendant has retained it. He cannot now be heard to say that he did not expect to pay for it. His acts give him full benefit of plaintiff's work, and he should not, by his own testimony to a mental state of disapproval, be permitted to deny the legal effect of such acts. He could have refused or surrendered the picture, if dissatisfied, with no prejudice to any so-called "rights of privacy," as they existed before plaintiff, at defendant's request, put it in the latter's possession. The cases cited in the court's opinion (Leveau v. Clements, Tuck v. Priester, Pollard v. Photographic Co. and Prince Albert v. Strange) clearly have no relevancy. In them the plaintiff was attempting to acquire advantage to himself in breach of the understanding under which he had acquired an opportunity to do so. His motive was bad; approximately fraudulent. Here, on the contrary, plaintiff was attempting to confer a benefit upon defendant; in good faith believing that the latter's desire for a picture of his deceased wife would be best satisfied by the service rendered and tendered for acceptance or rejection by the latter. I think plaintiff is entitled, upon the facts, to recover the reasonable value of the benefit conferred on defendant, and therefore must dissent from the court's decision.

I fear that the marked prominence given to quotation from a dissenting opinion in Roberson v. Rochester Folding Box Co. 171 N. Y. 538, 59 L.R.A. 478, 89 Am. St. Rep. 828, 64 N. E. 442, may suggest approval of the views quoted as to existence of any legal right of privacy. I certainly am not prepared to yield concurrence therewith, nor did I understand that the court in any degree adopted them; but, on the contrary, decided to express no opinion on that important and vexed subject.

MILWAUKEE GAS LIGHT COMPANY,
Respt.

(128 Wis. 35, 107 N. W. 289.)

Master—foreman and laborer fellow servants.

One engaged in digging a trench for a gas main across a public street at night, and the foreman in charge of the gang, are fellow servants, so that the master is not liable for injuries to the former through the failure of the latter to inform him that more cars may be expected on the tracks laid in the street, or in failing to keep watch and warn him of the approach of a car which strikes him.

(April 17, 1906.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Milwaukee County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Cassoday, Ch. J.:

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while in the employ of the defendant as a common day laborer digging a trench in which there was to be laid one of the defendant's gas mains on Downer avenue, at its intersection with the defendant's gas main on Lake avenue. It appears from the map in evidence, and is undisputed, that Downer avenue runs in a north and south direction, that Lake avenue runs in a north-easterly and southwesterly direction, and that Sheridan avenue runs from Lake avenue, and at right angles with it, in a northwesterly direction. The point where the gas main to be constructed on Downer avenue was to be connected with the gas main on Lake avenue was on the westerly side of Lake avenue, a little northerly of the northerly line of Sheridan avenue projected easterly, and on the west side of Downer avenue, but near the middle thereof. At the time of the injury the plaintiff and six other men were engaged in digging the trench in which the gas main was to be laid in Downer avenue near such proposed point of intersection, and the trench had then been dug to the depth of 15 inches; and at the time the same was being dug or tunneled under some of the street-car tracks on Lake avenue, where they turned onto Downer avenue, the men so at work were faced toward the south, the plaintiff being further to the south than any of the others, and where he would be struck by a passing street car unless he got out of the way. While so at work a street car suddenly and without being observed by the plaintiff came down on Downer avenue from the north, and struck the plaintiff on the left side or hip, and severely injured him. That occurred about 2 o'clock on Sunday morning, July 26, 1903. The men had worked there the Saturday before, and on that day were told by the foreman to return to the work the next morning as soon as the cars stopped running, which was supposed to be about 2 o'clock A. M. The men, including the plaintiff, reached the place about 11 o'clock on that Saturday evening and lay down on the grass to rest before starting to work. The foreman arrived between 1 o'clock and 2 o'clock in the morning, and after a little while ordered the men to start to work, and soon after the accident occurred. The work was being done under the supervision of the defendant's foreman, who had stepped away just prior to the injury, and was at the defendant's tool wagon, a block away, at the time of the accident, without stationing anyone to keep a lookout during his absence. The early morning hour was selected for doing the work, so as to avoid the presence of the cars. Two cars passed on the track in question after the men were set to work,—the one which struck the plaintiff, and another about fourteen minutes afterwards. The foreman testified that the men requested him to set them at work because it was cold, and that, when he directed them to begin work, he told them, in the presence of the plaintiff, that there were a couple more cars to come down, and it was all right to go to work; that they would watch the cars. On that Saturday afternoon the foreman was told by the defendant's superintendent to station one man to keep a lookout for coming cars; that there was nothing unusual about such instructions. The reason for giving such instructions, according to the testimony of the superintendent, was that when men were working close to the track with their heads in line with the street car it was dangerous, though not dangerous if a man was careful on his own account. There was evidence tending to prove that, prior to the accident, the plaintiff was not told that other cars or any car was liable to pass after they went to work that morning, and that he was not warned by the foreman or anyone that a car was liable to pass after he so went to work. At the close of all the testimony the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, and from the judgment entered thereon, dismissing the complaint, the plaintiff brings this appeal.

Note.—As shown by note to Illinois Steel Co. v. Ziemkowski, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1161, there is some conflict on the question whether a servant whose duty it is to warn others is in that matter a vice principal, though the trend of the decisions is to hold that he is not, unless his superiority of rank is such as to make him a vice principal, or some special consideration brings the facts within the domain of some duty which is conceded to be nondelegable.

Cassoday, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no claim of any want of care on the part of the defendant or its superintendent in selecting the foreman who had charge of the men at the time of the accident, nor in failing to instruct or direct him to conduct the work in a way to save the men, as far as possible, from being struck by passing street cars. There is no claim that the place where the men were at work was in itself inherently dangerous. It is conceded that the work in which the plaintiff was engaged at the time of the accident was being done under the supervision of the foreman. The only negligence claimed is that the foreman failed to inform the plaintiff that other cars were liable to pass at or about the time in question, or to provide a watchman to warn the plaintiff and other workmen of the approach of such car. The trial court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, on the ground that such alleged negligence of the foreman, if any, was the negligence of the plaintiff's fellow servant, for which the defendant was not liable.

The important question is whether the plaintiff and the foreman were fellow servants at the time in question. As claimed by counsel for the plaintiff, the answer to the question does not depend upon the rank or grade of the negligent servant, but upon the nature or character of the act in the performance of which the injury was incurred. Dwyer v. American Exp. Co. 82 Wis. 307, 33 Am. St. Rep. 44, 52 N. W. 304; Kliegel v. Weisel & V. Mfg. Co. 84 Wis. 148, 53 N. W. 1119; Stutz v. Armour, 84 Wis. 623, 54 N. W. 1000; Wiskie v. Montello Granite Co. 111 Wis. 443, 449, 87 Am. St. Rep. 885, 87 N. W. 461, and cases there cited; Okonski v. Pennsylvania & O. Fuel Co. 114 Wis. 448, 90 N. W. 429. In several of these cases the negligent act complained of was the act of the foreman conducting the work. Thus, in one of the cases cited, it was held: "A foreman who personally conducts the blasting in a quarry is a fellow servant of those who assist him in such work, and one of the latter cannot recover for injuries caused by the unexpected explosion, beneath the rock upon which he was at work, of powder which the foreman had negligently permitted to remain there after the partial explosion of a blast." Wiskie v. Montello Granite Co. supra. In another of the cases cited it was held that "the facts that the foreman had authority to hire, discharge, and direct the dock force, and was charged with the duty to see that the docks were so operated as to be safe, and to provide necessary lights, signals, and warnings, did not render him other than a fellow servant of plaintiff while performing the specific act mentioned." Okonski v. Pennsylvania & O. Fuel Co. supra. As indicated, the place where the plaintiff was at work at the time of the injury was not of itself inherently dangerous. It was only made dangerous by the approach of the street car over which the defendant had no control. Of course, it has often been held by this and other courts that it is the duty of the master to provide and maintain for his servants a reasonably safe place for the doing of their work, and that such duty is personal to the master and cannot be delegated to another. Bessex v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 45 Wis. 477; Hulehan v. Green Bay, W. & St. P. R. Co. 58 Wis. 319, 17 N. W. 17, 68 Wis. 520, 32 N. W. 529; McClarney v. Chicago M. & St. P.

R. Co. 80 Wis. 277, 280, 49 N. W. 963. But that principle has no application to a case where, as here, the place in itself was reasonably safe, but was liable to be rendered unsafe by the sudden approach of a car, which might have been foreseen, and therefore avoided, had not the foreman failed to notify the plaintiff that other cars were liable to pass, or to provide a watchman to warn the plaintiff and other workmen of the approach of such car.

As indicated in some of the cases cited, the mere fact that the negligent person happened to be such foreman did not prevent him from being the fellow servant of the men. Numerous additional illustrations might be cited. Thus, it has been held that a foreman in a lumber yard and an employee therein are fellow servants. Hoth v. Peters, 55 Wis. 405, 13 N. W. 219. So, the foreman in raising and erecting a water tank and the workmen under him are fellow servants. Peschel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 62 Wis. 338, 21 N. W. 269. So, a watchman employed to guard a car repairer is a fellow servant of such repairer. Luebke v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 63 Wis. 91, 53 Am. Rep. 266, 23 N. W. 136. So, a brakeman on an approaching freight train was held to be a fellow servant of workmen engaged in repairing the track, but who failed to give sufficient notice to those in charge of the train. Cooper v. Milwaukee & P. du Ch. R. Co. 23 Wis. 668. See Toner v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 69 Wis. 197, 198, 31 N. W. 104, 33 N. W. 433, and cases there cited. We must hold that the plaintiff in this action and the foreman in charge of the men were fellow servants, and hence that the verdict was properly directed in favor of the defendant.

The judgment of the Superior Court for Milwaukee County is affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

I. V. NEWMAN et al.

v.

W. C. NEWMAN et al., Appts.

(— W. Va. —, 55 S. E. 377.)

Will—trust—life estate.

1. The will below does not vest in the widow an absolute fee estate, but vests in her a life estate, and creates a trust in her as trustee for the benefit of her children.

Trust—laches.

2. The defense of laches, though not applying, as a general rule, to an express trust, does apply to a constructive trust. 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Same—constructive.

3. Where a trustee holding under an express trust uses the trust property in the purchase and conveyance of land to another, in violation of the trust and with notice of it, it creates a constructive, and not an express, trust in that third person; and laches will apply in favor of such person as a defense against the enforcement of such trust. Limitation of action—coal in place.

4. The statute of limitations, for want of adverse actual possession, does not apply in favor of one claiming coal in state of nature in place not developed.

Case Note.—Laches as a bar to enforcement of trust as against one who knowingly purchased trust property in violation of the terms of an express trust:—The doctrine of the case in hand, that laches will defeat the right of the beneficiary of an express trust to enforce it as against a purchaser of the trust property in violation of the trust with knowledge thereof, is fully supported by authority, and is in harmony with the equally well-established doctrine that the defense of laches is available to the trustee himself where he has repudiated the trust. (See case note in 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 986, on "Laches which will defeat relief after the repudiation of an express trust.") One who acquires property with notice, either actual or constructive, that his grantor holds title as trustee stands in the grantor's shoes, and holds the property charged with the trust.

of cases under discussion is equivalent to a repudiation of the trust for the purpose of establishing a basis for the imputation of laches on the part of the cestui que trust. As bearing upon the right of the trustee of an express trust to invoke the doctrine of laches as a bar to the assertion of rights by the beneficiary, reference may also be made to the cases of Oliver v. Piatt, 3 How. 333, 11 L. ed. 622, and Speidel v. Henrici, 120 U. S. 377, 30 L. ed. 718, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 610, which hold that, though the mere lapse of time constitutes of itself no bar to the enforcement of a subsisting trust, yet time will begin to run against a trust from the time when it is openly disavowed by the trustee, who insists upon an adverse right and interest which are fully and unequivocally made known to the cestui que trust, as when, for instance, such transactions take place between the trustee and the cestui que trust as would, in case of tenants in common, amount to an ouster of one of them by the other; Swift v. Smith, 25 C. C. A. 154, 49 U. S. App. 181, 79 Fed. 709, and Bruner v. Finley, 187 Pa. 389, 41 Atl. 334, which hold that the principle that neither time nor laches will bar the right to enforce an express trust is subject to the exception that, when the trust is repudiated and knowledge of the repudiation is brought home to the cestui que trust, the case is brought within the ordinary rules of limitation and laches; and Morse v. Hill, 136 Mass. 60, which seems to recognize the doctrine that laches may defeat the right of a beneficiary to repudiate a sale of the part of the trust estate, made by the trustees to themselves through a third person for an inadequate consideration; although it was held in that case that, under the circumstances, the beneficiary could not be regarded as guilty of laches.

The question under discussion was directly passed upon in Robinson v. Pierce, 118 Ala. 273, 45 L.R.A. 66, 72 Am. St. Rep. 160, 24 So. 984, which holds that a purchaser from a trustee in contravention of the trust in no sense becomes thereby an express trustee, but is a trustee in invitum 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Isaac Newman died in 1836, leaving a will and a large estate, consisting of various tracts of land and slaves and other personal property. His will contained the following provisions: "I do hereby authorize my beloved widow to dispose of my property real and personal when it shall be for the benefit of the family and in all cases it shall be legal in law for the benefit of my by construction of law, holding actually in his own right and in hostility to the world, and that staleness will bar a suit by the parties beneficially interested to set aside the conveyance by the trustee in breach of the trust.

And in Lide v. Park, 135 Ala. 131, 93 Am. St. Rep. 17, 33 So. 175, it was held that, where the statutory trusteeship of a husband over the separate estate of his wife was repudiated by his assertion of title in himself, acquired by bidding in the property at a foreclosure sale, and again by his conveyance of the property to third parties, an action to enforce the trust against such property in behalf of the wife or those claiming through her, nearly twenty years after the foreclosure, was barred by the lapse of time, to say nothing of the question of laches.

In Williams v. First Presby. Soc. 1 Ohio St. 478, it was held that, where a trustee makes a conveyance in derogation of the trust, there is such a disclaimer thereof as to render lapse of time thereafter a bar to the assertion of the trust as against those claiming under the conveyance.

In Redford v. Clarke, 100 Va. 115, 40 S. E. 630, it was held that laches would preclude the enforcement of a trust against the purchasers at a trustee's sale on the ground that such sale was contrary to the terms of the trust.

So, also, in Groome v. Belt, 171 Pa. 74, 32 Atl. 1132, it was held that laches would preclude the enforcement of an express trust as against persons taking under the will of the creator of the trust property which was originally the subject of the trust, but for which the creator of the trust had subsequently substituted other property.

In Lammer v. Stoddard, 103 N. Y. 672, 9 N. E. 328, it was held that the borrower of a trust fund with knowledge of its character is not an actual trustee, but is at most only a trustee ex maleficio or by implication or construction of law, to whom the statute of limitations is available as a defense to an action to enforce the trust.

In McLafin v. Jones, 155 Ill. 539, 40 N. E. 330, it was held that, where one third of eight children namely Junius Eastham Newman, Virginia Eastham Newman, Mary Cath-rine Newman, William Walter Newman, John Green Newman, Susan Ann Newman, Sarah Jane Newman, Isaac Vanburen Newman and if any other shall be born to my wife within nine months after my death. And the court is not to require security for the faithful discharge as I have unbounded confidence in her virtue and love for the interest of those she is left to protect. Subject however to the possibility that she should become the wife of another man; in that event she is to surrender my childrens' property as before named to my brother-in-laws William George and Albert G. Eastham, who I do appoint my Executors in that contingency." He left a number of children. Mary Newman, the widow, made deeds to different children of different tracts of land vested in her by the will, and by her will devised other lands to some of the children, leaving out W. W. Newman, her son. To her said son she conveyed the half of the home farm of 384 acres. The controversy in this case arises from the fact that the widow, Mary Newman, conveyed to Luman Gibbs a small tract of land vested in her by her husband's will in exchange for the coal in a tract of 400 acres of land owned by Gibbs, and Gibbs conveyed said coal to W. W. Newman. Thus Mary Newman purchased said coal with land which she derived under her husband's will. I. V. Newman and others, as children and grandchildren of said Isaac Newman and Mary Newman, brought a chancery suit against the heirs of W. W. Newman, claiming that, as the said 400 acres of coal was purchased with land of the estate of Isaac Newman, it was a trust estate in the hands of W. W. Newman for the common benefit of all those interested in the estate of Isaac Newman; that Mary Newman held the land which she conveyed to Gibbs in trust for the benefit of the children of her husband; and that W. W. Newman was well aware of such trust, and took the deed for the said coal with notice of such trust, and therefore held it subject to their rights, and asked a partition thereof for the common benefit of all entitled under the will of Isaac Newman. The circuit court of Mason county sustained the plaintiffs' claim, holding the land in the hands of the heirs of W. W. Newman to be still subject to the trust created by the will, and imposed upon Mary Newman as trustee under it, and decreed that the said coal be partitioned. From this decree the heirs of W. W. Newman have appealed.

The first question that arises in the case is this: The defense contends that the will vested in Mary Newman an absolute estate in fee for her own absolute use, to be conveyed away as she might choose, without any account to the children of her husband; while the plaintiffs claim that the will created an express trust in Mary Newman, by which she held the estate in trust for the benefit of the children of her husband, saving a life estate to herself. The defense relies upon that rule of law given in many decisions, that where a will devises land to a person to dispose of at his pleasure, such devisee has the absolute the money realized from the sale of a decedent's property was retained by his executor by direction of the court, to be loaned out for the benefit of the widow during her life, and such funds were misappropriated, laches will bar the right of the persons entitled thereto to reclaim such funds from persons receiving them with knowledge of their character.

And in Morris v. Duke, 2 Patton & H. (Va.) 462, it was held, where property belonging to a decedent's estate was assigned by an administrator to his individual creditor in exchange for other securities, which was thereupon assigned by the creditor to the surety upon the administrator's bond, that, assuming a constructive trust in the property so assigned by the administrator to arise from the transaction, assuiscence therein for twenty years by the parties beneficially interested would bar the right to enforce it against the creditor.

Where an administrator purchases property indirectly at a sale of decedent's estate for the payment of debts, he is simply the trustee of a constructive trust, to the enforcement of which laches is a bar. Miles v. Wheeler, 43 Ill. 123.

Where one of the administrators and his brother, who were sons of the decedent, acting for the best interests of the estate, become the purchasers of property belonging to the estate, there is only an implied constructive trust in favor of the heirs, the right to enforce which against the property will be barred by laches. Hendrickson v. Hendrickson, 42 N. J. Eq. 657, 9 Atl. 742.

The doctrine that laches may preclude the enforcement by the beneficiary of an express trust of his rights as against a purchaser of the trust property seems also to have been recognized in the case of Blake v. Traders' Nat. Bank, 145 Mass. 13, 12 N. E. 414, in which the trustee had pledged stock which the pledgee had notice belonged to the trust estate to secure an individual debt; in Cantwell v. Crawley, 188 Mo. 44, 86 S. W. 251, in which land subject to an express trust had been sold to a purchaser with notice; and in Sternfels v. Watson, 130 Fed. 505, where the trustee had executed a mortgage upon the trust property for his individual benefit; although in none of these cases were the circumstances under consideration held to amount to laches.

property, even though his interest is called by the will a "life estate," and there is a provision whereby what may remain undisposed of at the death of the devisee goes to another person. Melson v. Doe, 4 Leigh, 408; Milhollen v. Rice, 13 W. Va. 519; Wilmoth v. Wilmoth, 34 W. Va. 426, 12 S. E. 731; Englerth v. Kellar, 50 W. Va. 259, 40 S. E. 465; Brown v. Strother, 102 Va. 145, 47 S. E. 236; Cole v. Cole, 79 Va. 251; Hall v. Palmer, 87 Va. 354, 11 L.R.A. 610, 24 Am. St. Rep. 653, 12 S. E. 618; Burwell v. Anderson, 3 Leigh, 348. But we hold that this doctrine does not apply to this case, because we think that it is plain that, though the testator intended to give the widow a support out of the whole estate, yet he did not intend her to consume the whole for her own purposes, but intended to vest in her the property for the benefit of her children. The will gives her a power of disposition, it is true, and that generally carries the absolute ownership; but, if the will evinces a different purpose, that power of disposition does not have that effect. In this case the will, while giving a power of disposition to the widow, yet declares that it is to be exercised for the benefit of the children, naming them. It does not say that she shall exercise the power of sale for her sole use, or that she may consume the proceeds. The will says she shall only exercise the power of disposition "when it shall be for the benefit of the family." This shows a restricted power of disposition. It shows that it can only be exercised for the benefit of the family, widow and children together. The very clause constituting the devise—the vital devising clause—tells that the devise to the widow is for the common benefit of the entire family. Moreover, the will makes the devise subject "to the possibility that she should become the wife of another man; in that event she is to surrender my children's property as before named to my brother-in-law." Now here the testator calls the property "my children's property," and provides for the widow's estate to end on her remarriage. If he intended to give her complete ownership, why this provision? We cannot help thinking that, while the testator intended to provide amply for his wife out of his large estate, he yet remembered that he had children to be provided for. He reposed full confidence in his wife to deal justly with his children; even in that clause he manifested an intent that his wife should care for and protect his children with the property vested in her. We deem it hardly necessary on this point to cite authority, since it is only a question of the purpose of Newman as manifested in his will; but I cite Cressap v. Cressap, 34 W. Va. 310, 12 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

S. E. 527, Milhollen v. Rice, 13 W. Va. 510, and Young v. Bradley, 101 U. S. 782, 25 L. ed. 1044, as reflecting light on this particular matter. As the will gives power of disposition to the widow for the benefit of the children, counsel ask, Who was to say when her act of sale would be proper. We answer, a court of equity, which has power to administer trusts and control trustees. If the will did confer absolute property upon Mary Newman, that would end the case, for she would have perfect right to exchange land which was derived from her husband for the coal, and give it to her son, W. W. Newman, free of any trust; but, as we deny that the will confers such absolute estate, we must go on with further questions arising in the case.

The plaintiffs properly claimed that the will created only a trust estate in Mary Newman, and they say that, as Mary Newman held the land in trust, so did W. W. Newman, and so do his heirs. They say that there is no difference between the tenure of Mary Newman and W. W. Newman. It is undeniable that W. W. Newman, when Gibbs conveyed the coal to him, had full notice of the trust aforesaid. It is settled law that one acquiring trust property with notice of a trust from the trustee is himself a trustee, holding the property on the same trust under which his grantor held it. "A trust fund may be pursued by the beneficiaries as long as the same can be identified, into any land or other form of investment made by the trustee, as the law raises an implied trust as to such property in their behalf." Marshall v. Hall, 42 W. Va. 641, 26 S. E. 300. See Crumrine v. Crumrine, 50 W. Va. 226, 88 Am. St. Rep. 859, 40 S. E. 341; Reel v. Reel (W. Va.) 52 S. E. 1023; Webb v. Bailey, 41 W. Va. 463, 23 S. E. 644; Heth v. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. 4 Gratt. 482, 50 Am. Dec. 88; Vance v. Kirk, 29 W. Va. 344, 1 S. E. 717; Barksdale v. Finney, 14 Gratt. 438. The many authorities sustaining this position are collected in that valuable work, American & English Decisions in Equity, vol. 2, p. 652, showing that trust funds may be followed up. Hogg's Equity Principles, 763, is full authority on this point. So the right of the plaintiffs to follow up this coal originally is very clear, but they are barred by great lapse of time. The conveyance of the coal to W. W. Newman from Gibbs dates August 16, 1853, and so does the deed from Mary Newman to Gibbs, and this suit was brought in 1902,—a great span of forty-nine years, and none of the parties under any disability. But the plaintiffs say that neither the statute of limitations nor laches applies. They argue that the statute of limitations does not apply to an express trust and that laches does not. "No statute of limitation runs against an express trust, nor does lapse of time avail until the duties are ended or the trust disavowed." Gapen v. Gapen, 41 W. Va. 422, 23 S. E. 579. Express trusts are not liable to the statute, and for the most part not liable to laches, though sometimes even an express trust is lost by great lapse of time. See Woods v. Stevenson, 43 W. Va. 149, 27 S. E. 309. That is the law of express trusts, and, if Mary Newman held the title to the coal which Gibbs conveyed to W. W. Newman, doubtless the trust would be enforceable against her; but W. W. Newman is not Mary Newman. She would hold under an express trust; he did not. What is the character of trust under which W. W. Newman held? It was not an express trust, but a constructive trust. Here lies the controlling distinction in this case. W. W. Newman did not take as a trustee by the terms of his deed, as that is an absolute conveyance to him, thus denying any trusteeship. There is no competent evidence to prove that he agreed to hold in trust. I. V. Newman says he did so, but W. W. Newman being dead, and I. V. Newman being a plaintiff, and one to be benefited by the enforcement of the trust, his evidence is wholly incompetent. W. W. Newman, on the theory of the plaintiff, took his estate in the coal ex maleficio,—that is, in wrong; in fraud of the rights of those interested in the trust. He took in hostility to their rights, not in acknowledgment of their rights. Say that he took in fraud of their rights. Taking, however, with notice of the trust, equity would make him a constructive trustee under a constructive trust, not under an express trust. He never did a thing to recognize any obligation resting on him as trustee, nor did his heirs. Hogg's Equity Principles, § 552a, p. 738, classifies trusts in two general divisions,—“direct or express trusts (that is, those springing from the agreement of the parties), and into constructive or implied trusts (that is, those created by the rules and principles of equity). Under this latter class fall all those trusts known distinctively as implied or constructive, as well as those called ‘resultant’; those arising from acts of fraud or otherwise; in short, all those that do not spring from the agreement of the parties. . . . A constructive trust is one not created by any words either expressly or impliedly evincing a direct intention to create a trust, but only by the construction and operation of equity in order to satisfy the demands of justice.” I submit that W. W. Newman was not holding under an express trust, but under a constructive trust,—one made or created by the law of equity jurisprudence. Currence v. Ward, 43 W. Va. 367, 27 S. E. 329; 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

2 Minor, Inst. 188; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1123. This is not a trust assumed by the consent of Newman, but it is imposed upon him against his will by equity law, because he did a wrong in taking property bought with trust property. Such a trust is sometimes called an “involuntary trust” and sometimes a “trust ex maleficio.” “The basis of a constructive trust is fraud, actual or constructive.” 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1185. It is in the failure of counsel for the plaintiffs to recognize this distinction between express and constructive trusts that their contention fails. Thus, W. W. Newman, holding under a constructive trust, is protected by the lapse of forty-nine years. All the plaintiffs knew of his deed, as it was at once put on record. Outside of that, the evidence fully establishes notice on the plaintiffs of that deed. They were bound to know of it, and did know of it. Lafferty v. Lafferty, 42 W. Va. 783, 26 S. E. 262. True, the statute of limitations does not apply, because the coal was not developed, and there was no adverse possession of it, as it was in a state of nature. Wallace v. Elm Grove, 58 W. Va. 449, 52 S. E. 485. But, this being a suit to enforce a constructive trust, that limitation raised by equity law called “laches” does apply. It is not true that limitation and laches do not apply to any trust. They do not apply to express trusts but do apply to constructive trusts. Woods v. Stevenson, supra, holds that “express trusts, cognizable only in equity, are alone free from limitation created by laches or statute. All other trusts, whether legal or equitable, are either subject to the statute of limitations, or liable to be barred by laches.” Hogg's Equity Principles, § 567, p. 757, plainly makes this distinction, saying that time does not run against a suit to enforce an express trust till the trustee denies the trust and the beneficiary has notice of it; “but those trusts which arise by operation of law, as all constructive trusts, are within the operation of the statute of limitations.” Many West Virginia and Virginia authorities are cited by Mr. Hogg. In 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1133, this distinction between express and constructive trusts, for the purpose of limitation, is recognized. There it is stated that when the trust ends in any way the statute runs. The trust of Mary Newman—the express trust—ended with the conveyance by her to Gibbs of trust land, in wrong, for the purchase of the coal. Then it was a hostile claim by W. W. Newman. Then time began to run. A mere constructive trustee may protect himself by limitation. Sheppard v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 373. Laches lies “to suits to charge another with a constructive trust, and the like." Hogg, Equity Principles, p. 417. So, the plaintiffs are barred of relief by laches. So many years fled away (nearly half a century) from the date of the deed from Mary Newman to Gibbs and the date of the deed from Gibbs to W. W. Newman for the coal (both the same date) 16th August, 1853, until 1902, when this suit was brought, the adverse parties knowing of these deeds. No stronger case could be presented for the application of the doctrine stated in Trader v. Jarvis, 23 W. Va. 100; that is: "Delay in the assertion of a right, unless satisfactorily explained, even where it does not constitute a positive statutory bar, operates in equity as an evidence of assent, acquiescence, or waiver; and especially is such the case in suits to set aside transactions on account of fraud or infancy. Laches and neglect are always discountenanced by a court of equity." See Phillips v. Piney Coal Co. 53 W. Va. 543, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1040, 44 S. E. 774. But the defense of laches is rendered clearer still as a bar by the fact that the immediate parties to the transaction, who above all others could speak the truth upon it, had been slumbering in their tombs for many years when this suit was brought. The mother, Mary Newman, died in 1871, seventeen years after the recordation of these deeds. W. W. Newman died in 1884, thirty years after those deeds were made. While Mary Newman and W. W. Newman lived no suit was brought, no claim made; and after W. W. Newman died they waited eighteen years before attacking his children. From appearances these people were people of character. It is not to be presumed that a just mother would do injustice among her children. It is not to be supposed that W. W. Newman, a licensed attorney, and a member of the Virginia senate, would do a wrong to his brothers and sisters. Why this coal was conveyed to him we do not know. If he and his mother were in life, they might give us a perfect defense and justification of this act; but their lips are sealed, and long have been. It is, however, fair to say that the long acquiescence on the part of the other children in this act of the mother and brother, their long silence while the mother and brother were in life, speaks forcibly to tell us that there is some reasonable justification of this transaction. If there had not been, why this long silence and acquiescence by those deeply interested? It is a strong argument against any action by a court of equity after so long a time that the parties to the transaction are dead, so that the truth cannot be known. This is always an argument against relief. Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 469 (syl. point 6). The disinclination of courts to enforce trusts after long delay is 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) well stated in the opinion by Judge Dent and the authorities given in Woods v. Stevenson, 43 W. Va. 149, 27 S. E. 309.

Another argument against any relief lies in the fact that Mary Newman conveyed and devised to various children different tracts of land, some of which have been sold away and others encumbered by deeds of trust, thus involving rights of third parties. How can these lands be brought into hotchpot?

Another argument advanced by the plaintiffs is that in 1852 the members of the Newman family met and agreed upon a partition of the land orally, which was carried partly into execution by the conveyance by Mary Newman of some lands to some children, and that by that oral family agreement certain of the children were to get the tract of land out of which Mary Newman conveyed a part to Gibbs in exchange for the coal conveyed by Gibbs to W. W. Newman. How can this help the plaintiffs? Saying that that is so, it makes their case worse, because it shows that W. W. Newman, in violation of the agreement, diverted the land from the course it was to take by that agreement, and in conjunction with Mary Newman used it to acquire a deed to himself for the coal. If this be so, surely it was no express trust, but purely a constructive trust,—an act in character adversary to others under said family agreement, and, if possible, time applies all the more from that agreement. It cannot be thought for a moment that W. W. Newman by this act became a voluntary trustee. It was an act of wrong against his brothers,—the wrong of having the trustee divert the trust property from the use to which it was to go under that family agreement; an act repudiating that agreement. Surely he held not as trustee to execute that agreement. I will add that letters from I. V. Newman and Emma Newman to the children of W. W. Newman treat this coal as the legitimate property of W. W. Newman. I. V. Newman pointed out to W. W. Newman's children that the coal land owned by their father, and held it out to them as belonging to them. He paid taxes for them on the coal out of their money. Through these many years W. W. Newman and his children paid taxes on this coal, the other parties paying none. This goes to repel a trust, and shows a recognition of W. W. Newman's right as just. If they owned an interest, why not help pay taxes? Several of the children in numerous ways recognized the right of W. W. Newman and his children to this coal. A writing signed by W. W. Newman, dated 28th November, 1870, is relied upon. It certifies that about 1853 there was an agreement on a division of the property left by Isaac Newman, and that by a deed to certain land thereafter he received his portion in full of said estate, and had no claim on the estate of his mother. To what deed does this refer? Both the deed from Gibbs and that from his mother for half the home farm were after that family agreement. It may refer to the deed for the coal. Anyhow, it is only an admission that he had received his share; it does not meet the defense of laches.

What excuse for long delay in suing is given? One that the mother was old, and her children did not wish to disturb her peace. This is no legal excuse. Besides, they would not be suing her, but W. W. Newman, and they waited so long after she died. Another excuse is that W. W. Newman was resident in Virginia. He and his sons after him were frequently in Mason county, visiting some of the plaintiffs, and could have been personally served with process. But personal service was not necessary, since the suit to enforce the trust by partition or conveyance to the heirs was in nature an in rem proceeding.

For these reasons, we must reverse the decree of the Circuit Court, and dismiss the plaintiff's bill without relief.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE E. LLOYD & COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

NELSON EDWARD MATTHEWS et al.

(223 Ill. 477, 79 N. E. 172.)

Corporation—contract—execution.

1. Execution by the president of a corporation, on its behalf and for its benefit, of a guaranty which the corporation has power

Case Note.—Presumption that a contract within the powers of a corporation is within the authority of its president:—The extent to which it is necessary to go in proving the authority of a person to act on behalf of a corporation has varied with the changes in the methods of corporate administration attendant upon the development of the corporation as a factor in modern business. This has resulted in a diversity of views as to the showing from which authority to act for the corporation may be deduced. In some jurisdictions the early rule is still adhered to that authority from the board of directors must be shown, while in others such authority is regarded as properly inferable from a proved course of business. But in a number of decisions, of which the case in hand is one, regard is had to the fact that the business of a corporation is now ordinarily carried on by its administrative officers, from which it is to be inferred that acts done by them, and especially by the president, who is the chief administrative officer, within the scope of

to make, is sufficient to establish the liability of the corporation in the absence of anything to show that he did not act by authority of the corporation, notwithstanding the corporation, by verified plea, puts in issue the execution of the instrument.
Instruction—immateriality.

2. If, after having notice of the terms of a guaranty written over his indorsement, the payee of a note ratifies it, any error in an instruction that it was immaterial if the guaranty was written before or after the signature was placed on the note, if the signature was placed there with the intention of guaranteeing it and the words were written in accordance with that purpose, is harmless.

(October 23, 1906.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enforce a guaranty of a note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bangs, Wood, & Bangs, for appellant:

Where the execution of a contract of guaranty is denied by verified plea, special authority of the president to execute such contract on behalf of the corporation must be shown.

Park Hotel Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 30 C. C. A. 409, 58 U. S. App. 674, 86 Fed. 746; National Park Bank v. German-American Mut. W. & Secur. Co. 116 N. Y. 292, 5 L.R.A. 673, 22 N. E. 567; McLellan v. Detroit File Works, 56 Mich. 579, 23 N. W. 321; Stark Bank v. United States Pottery Co. 34 Vt.

the corporate powers, were duly authorized. The question is, in principle, one of agency, the presumptions being the same that obtain as to the authority of an agent under like circumstances.

It is said in Stokes v. New Jersey Pottery Co. 46 N. J. L. 237: "The powers of the president of a corporation, virtute officii, over its business and property are strictly the powers of an agent,—powers delegated to him by the directors, who are the managers of the corporation, and the persons in whom, as its representatives, the control of its business and property is vested. If the corporation be organized for business purposes, the president is its chief executive officer. He may, without any special authority from the board of directors, perform all acts of an ordinary nature, which, by usage or necessity, are incident to his office, and may bind the corporation by contracts in matters arising in the usual course of its business."

In determining the extent to which the doctrine under discussion has been adopted, 144; Rice v. Peninsular Club, 52 Mich. 87, 17 N. W. 708; Peterborough R. Co. v. Nashua & L. R. Co. 59 N. H. 385.

Indorsement of a promissory note by the payee is a contract in writing, and cannot be varied by parol evidence.

Hately v. Pike, 162 Ill. 241, 53 Am. St. Rep. 304, 44 N. E. 441.

Messrs. Peckham, Smith, Packard, & Ap Madoc, for appellees:

An act pertaining to the business of the corporation, not clearly foreign to the general power of the president, done through him, will be presumed to have been authorized.

Cozzen's & B. Typesetting Co. v. Western Ranch & Irrig. Co. 112 Ill. App. 309;

the essential inquiry, then, is whether the courts allow the usage or custom of corporations generally to act through their presidents to be taken into consideration without proof of such custom or usage in the case of the particular corporation involved. In doing this, care must be taken to avoid confusing cases involving the point under discussion with the decisions which pass upon the sufficiency of the proof of authority adduced in the given case, and cases in which the corporation has been held to be bound by way of estoppel. It is, however, difficult, in arranging the decisions, to observe a rigid line of demarcation, since many of the cases which hinge upon the sufficiency of the evidence of authority adduced also discuss the presumptions as to authority that may be indulged in. Several of the following decisions from which quotations have been taken are of this kind; and in several the authority of the president to act for the corporation in the instance in question was only incidentally involved, the question having arisen in suits between other parties.

In Mitchell v. Deeds, 49 Ill. 416, 95 Am. Dec. 621, it is said: "The doctrine seems to be settled that, the president of a corporate body being its head, and through him the usual affairs of the company are constantly performed, and such acts are incident to the execution of the trust reposed in him, such as custom or necessity has imposed upon the office, he may perform without express authority. And it is immaterial whether such authority exists by virtue of his office, or is imposed by the course of business of the company."

See also, to the same effect, State Nat. Bank v. Union Nat. Bank, 168 Ill. 519, 48 N. E. 82.

And in Glover v. Lee, 140 Ill. 102, 29 N. E. 680, it is said: "As a general rule corporations act through their presidents, and an act done through the president will be presumed to be authorized, unless shown to be otherwise."

In Smith v. Smith, 62 Ill. 493, it is said: "In the absence of legislative enactment or 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Glover v. Lee, 140 Ill. 102, 29 N. E. 680; Snyder Bros. v. Bailey, 165 Ill. 447, 46 N. E. 452; Bank of Minneapolis v. Griffin, 168 Ill. 317, 48 N. E. 154.

It is immaterial whether the words of guaranty were placed on the instrument before or after signature.

Kaestner v. First Nat. Bank, 170 Ill. 322, 48 N. E. 998; Lennon v. Goodspeed, 89 Ill. 440.

Vickers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Nelson E. Matthews and Clark H. Rice, banking partners, doing business at Ottawa, Ohio, brought an action of assumpsit against George E. Lloyd & Co. a corporation, on provision made in the by-laws, corporations usually act through their president, or those representing him. He being the legal head of the body, when an act pertaining to the business of the company is performed by him, the presumption will be indulged that the act is legally done, and is binding upon the body."

See also, to the same effect, Gubbins v. Bank of Commerce, 79 Ill. App. 150; Chicago Pneumatic Tool Co. v. H. W. Johns Mfg. Co. 101 Ill. App. 349.

In White v. Sheppard, 41 App. Div. 113, 58 N. Y. Supp. 563, it is held that the president of a real-estate company, as such, possessed the power prima facie to execute a conveyance of its property.

In First Nat. Bank v. G. V. B. Min. Co. 89 Fed. 439, it was said: "The authority which the public may presume is lodged with an officer of a corporation depends much upon the nature of the office, and the character and general objects of the corporation. When any officer is given general authority to manage its business, and especially when he is one of its chief officers, his presumed authority is extended to include any act that can be necessary in the conduct of its business, or that can tend to the promotion of its objects."

In National State Bank v. Vigo County Nat. Bank, 141 Ind. 352, 50 Am. St. Rep. 330, 40 N. E. 799, in which the question arose upon the mortgagee's demurrer to a complaint filed by a creditor of the mortgagor corporation to set aside the mortgage as having been executed by the president without authority, it was said: "When a contract is made in the name of a corporation by the president in the usual course of business, which the directors have power to authorize him to make or to ratify after it is made, the presumption is that the contract is binding on the corporation until it is shown that the same was not authorized or ratified."

In the following cases, in which the authority of the president was put in issue by the corporation, the presumption that his act was duly authorized seems to have been the indorsement and guaranty on the following promissory note:

$1,500.00.

Ottawa, Ohio, July 25, 1902.

Sixty days after date, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of George E. Lloyd & Co. fifteen hundred dollars, payable at the banking house of Matthews & Rice, Ottawa, Ohio. Value received. If not paid at maturity to bear eight per cent interest from maturity.

Columbia Telephone Manf. Co. [Seal.]

By G. M. Risser, Prest. [Seal.]

W. M. Rees, Secy. [Seal.]

On the back of the note appears the following:

Payment guaranteed. Protest, demand and notice of nonpayment waived.

Geo. E. Lloyd & Co.,
By E. C. Williams, President.

To the declaration, which contained two special counts (one on the indorsement and one on the guaranty) and the common counts, appellant pleaded the general issue and a special plea, verified by affidavit, denying the execution of the guaranty. From a judgment for the face of the note in the circuit court of Cook county an appeal was taken as a basis for holding the corporation bound thereby.

The case of Chicago Pneumatic Tool Co. v. Munsell, 107 Ill. App. 344, was an action brought against a corporation for the agreed price of certain mica washers to be used in installing an electric plant in the factory operated by the corporation, furnished upon an order given by its president. The presumption in favor of the authority of the president was held to support a recovery, the court saying: "The general rule is, that a corporation acts through its president, and through him executes its contracts and agreements; and an act pertaining to the business of the corporation, not clearly foreign to the general power of the president, done through him, will, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be presumed to have been authorized to be done by the corporate body."

In White v. Elgin Creamery Co. 108 Iowa, 522, 79 N. W. 283, in which a general denial was interposed by the defendant corporation in an action brought on a contract made by the president to purchase milk for its creamery, it was said that, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, the president of the corporation will be presumed to have authority to act in all matters arising in the ordinary course of its business.

But where it was provided by statute that a note is to be deemed genuine and admitted, unless the genuineness of the signature is denied under oath; and the genuineness of a note executed by its president was denied by the corporation,—such note was held inadmissible in evidence without proof of the president's authority. Marshall Field Co. v. Oren Ruffcorn Co. 117 Iowa, 157, 90 N. W. 618.

In Little Saw Mill Valley Turnp. Co. v. Federal Street & P. Valley Pass. R. Co. 194 Pa. 144, 75 Am. St. Rep. 690, 45 Atl. 66, an action upon a contract made by the president of a railway company in relation to the compensation to be paid a turnpike company for the use of its roadway, it was held that it could not be presumed that an act which was a proper act to do on behalf of the corporation was done under circumstances rendering it improper.

The doctrine that, where a contract made in the name of a corporation by its president is one the corporation has power to authorize the president to make, or to ratify after it has been made, the burden is upon the corporation of showing that it was not authorized or ratified, is also laid down in the cases of Patterson v. Robinson, 116 N. Y. 193, 22 N. E. 372; United States Nat. Bank v. Homestead Bank, 46 N. Y. S. R. 173, 18 N. Y. Supp. 758; Patterson v. Ongley Electric Co. 87 Hun, 462, 34 N. Y. Supp. 209. Affirmed without opinion in 155 N. Y. 674, 49 N. E. 1101; Davies v. Harvey Steel Co. 6 App. Div. 166, 39 N. Y. Supp. 791.

On the other hand, in Mt. Sterling & J. Turnp. Road Co. v. Looney, 1 Met. (Ky.) 550, 71 Am. Dec. 491, an action for work and labor alleged to have been performed for a corporation under the employment of its president, it was held that the corporation was entitled to an instruction that a promise by the president did not bind the corporation, unless it was proved that he was authorized by the corporation to make the promise.

In Mathias v. White Sulphur Springs Asso. 19 Mont. 359, 48 Pac. 624, it was held that a corporation organized to acquire town sites and erect buildings could not be held liable on a contract to prepare plans for a business block made by its president, in the absence of proof that such contract was authorized by the corporation, apparently upon the ground that such a contract was not part of the ordinary routine business, although within the powers of the corporation.

In Des Moines Mfg. & Supply Co. v. Tilford Mill Co. 9 S. D. 542, 70 N. W. 839, it was held that a corporation was not bound by the act of its president in ordering machinery for its mill in the absence of proof of authority from the board of directors, in accordance with the general rule that the corporate powers can be exercised only by the board of directors.

And in Lyndon Mill Co. v. Lyndon Literary & Biblical Inst. 63 Vt. 581, 22 Am. St. Rep. 783, 22 Atl. 575, it was held that the fact that lumber to be used in repairing a building of the corporation was ordered by its president is insufficient to sustain the presumption of authority, the general authority to act for the corporation not being shown.

prosecuted to the appellate court for the first district, where the judgment below was affirmed, and appellant prosecutes a further appeal to this court. Since the judgment of the appellate court settles all the controverted questions of fact adversely to the contention of the appellant, we need only to consider the questions of law raised.

1. It is contended that, even though it be conceded that George E. Lloyd & Company, by E. C. Williams, its president, signed the guaranty, still, as a matter of law, the corporation cannot be held liable without proof of special authority from the corporation to its president to execute the contract of guaranty. A corporation can act only through its agents, and the president of a corporation, as the agent and corporate representative, has the power, in the ordinary course of business and in furtherance of the corporate interests, to execute contracts and to bind the company in so doing. He is, by virtue of his office, recognized as the business head of the company, and any contract pertaining to the corporate affairs, within the general powers of such officer, executed by the president on behalf of his corporation, will, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be presumed to have been done by authority of the corporation. Atwater v. American Exch. Nat. Bank, 152 Ill. 605, 38 N. E. 1017; Bank of Minneapolis v. Griffin, 168 Ill. 314, 48 N. E. 154; Anderson v. South Chicago Brewing Co. 173 Ill. 213, 50 N. E. 655; Anderson Transfer Co. v. Fuller, 174 Ill. 221, 51 N. E. 251; Williams v. Harris, 198 Ill. 501, 64 N. E. 988. If the contract in question had been executed by some agent who ordinarily does not have the power to sign such instruments, and the execution had been put in issue by properly verified plea, as is the case here, then it would be necessary to go beyond the mere fact of the execution of the instrument and prove the authority of the agent to execute the same; but when the contract is properly executed for the corporation by its president, and it is such a contract as the corporation might lawfully make, the proof of the execution by the president is all that is required, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary showing that the contract was not made by the authority of the corporation.

In support of its contention that special authority in the president to sign this guaranty must be shown, the appellant cites and relies upon Dobson v. More, 164 Ill. 110, 56 Am. St. Rep. 184, 45 N. E. 243; Park Hotel Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 30 C. C. A. 409, 58 U. S. App. 674, 86 Fed. 746; National Park Bank v. German-American Mut. W. & Secur. Co. 116 N. Y. 281, 5 L.R.A. 673, 22

N. E. 567; and some other cases of like character. Language can be found in these cases, and perhaps in others, which, when considered alone and disconnected from the facts of the case wherein it is employed, seems to sustain the contention of appellant that in order to make a contract binding upon a corporation which has been executed by the company through its president, a resolution of the board of directors or a vote of the stockholders, or other special authority, must be shown where the execution of the instrument is put in issue by a verified plea. Upon a careful examination of these cases, it will be found that they are clearly distinguishable from the case at bar, in that the president, in the execution of the contracts, was using the credit of the corporation to serve his own private interests or that of some third party. Thus, in Dobson v. More, supra, where the president and general manager had express authority "to sign notes, drafts, and acceptances in the name of the company, and to make checks upon the company funds in bank for the payment of any proper indebtedness of the company," and the president, merely to aid another company to raise money, executed in behalf of his company a written guaranty on the note of another corporation, it was held, as against the holder of such note with notice of the facts, that the company could not be held liable on such guaranty; there being no authority whatever shown for the president to bind the company, as guarantor, for the indebtedness of another. The powers of a president to bind a corporation by contracts are limited to those matters concerning which the charters and by-laws and the statutes of the state authorize it to make contracts. In Park Hotel Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank, supra, where the president discounted a note for his own private benefit and indorsed by him in the name of the Park Hotel Company, of which he was president, and payable to himself, it was held that the corporation was not liable, and that the bank had notice, by the face of the note, that the president was exceeding his usual and ordinary powers in making a note to himself, and that in the absence of special authority from the corporation no recovery could be had. National Park Bank v. German-American Mut. W. & Secur. Co. supra, is a case in all essential features like Dobson v. More, supra, and the same rule is applied. Many other cases are to be found illustrating the doctrine announced in the decisions above referred to, but, since this court in Dobson v. More, supra, has reviewed many of these cases and approved them, no necessity exists to discuss them further. The case at bar does not fall within the exception to the general rule recognized in these cases; but, since the guaranty sued on was placed on the note of appellant, and the note was discounted for its benefit, and the proceeds thereof were remitted to appellant, the plainest principles of justice require that the company should be held bound by the act of its president without any proof of authority beyond that which must be presumed from the fact that the president in good faith, and in the regular course of corporate business, and for the benefit of the corporation, executed the instrument sued on.

2. It is next contended by appellant that the court erred in giving instructions for the appellee. Instruction No. 2 is as follows: "The court instructs the jury, as a matter of law, that it is immaterial whether the words of special guaranty are stamped or written on the back of a note above the signature of a guarantor at the time its signature is placed thereon, or afterwards, provided you believe, from the evidence, that the signature was in fact placed there for the purpose of guaranteeing the payment of the note, and the words as 'stamped or written are in accordance with such purpose.'" The objection pointed out to this instruction is that it ignores the question whether the contract of guaranty is ultra vires, and that it impliedly tells the jury that parol evidence can be heard to vary or alter an indorsement by the payee of a promissory note. There is no question in this case to which the doctrine of ultra vires can have any application. This objection needs no further consideration. The second objection is equally frivolous. The instruction says nothing about the admissibility of parol evidence to alter or vary the terms of a blank indorsement by the payee of a promissory note. If this instruction is to be understood as laying down the law that the holder of a promissory note indorsed in blank by the payee can write out a contract of special guaranty over the signature of the indorser, and rely on parol proof to establish that such was the agreement and understanding at the time of the indorsement, then the instruction is erroneous. There is a well-defined distinction between the contract of an indorser and that of a guarantor of commercial paper. The liability of an unconditional guarantor becomes independent and fixed upon the failure of the principal party to pay the money or perform the act guaranteed (Holm v. Jamieson, 173 Ill. 295, 45 L.R.A. 846, 50 N. E. 702), while that of an indorser is conditional until the statutory diligence has been shown (Bledsoe v. Graves, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

5 Ill. 382; Schuttler v. Piatt, 12 Ill. 417; Clayes v. White, 83 Ill. 540). In cases of a blank indorsement the owner of the note may fill out the formal assignment at any time before or at the trial; but this rule has never been so extended as to authorize the holder to write words of a special guaranty above a blank indorsement thereby changing the contract from one of indorsement to one of guaranty. The instruction under consideration is inartificially drawn; but, as applied to the facts in this case we do not think it was misleading. There was some conflict in the testimony as to whether the words above appellant's signature were placed there before it was signed or afterwards; but the evidence shows that, after the signature was placed on the back of the note, appellees wrote a letter to appellant, and also sent a telegram, asking if the indorsement on the note was satisfactory. In this correspondence appellees quoted the language of the guaranty, and received a reply from appellant that it was "perfectly satisfactory." This is an express ratification of the guaranty contract, and therefore it was, under the facts of this case, immaterial whether the words constituting the guaranty were on the note at the time of the signing or were placed there afterwards, since the appellant fully ratified the guaranty contract after it had a copy of it. Under these circumstances instruction No. 2 was harmless.

Errors complained of in giving other instructions and in refusing instructions asked by appellant have been carefully considered, and we see no error in any of the rulings of the court for which judgment should be reversed.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is therefore affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

ROYAL HIGHLANDERS, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF NEBRASKA et al.

(— Neb. —, 108 N. W. 183.)

Taxation—mutual benefit society.

1. A fraternal beneficiary association, conducted for the mutual benefit of its members and for the purpose of providing a fund for the payment of stated dues and fees

Headnotes by BARNES, J.

Case Note. — Fraternal benefit society as a benevolent or charitable association within exception statutes: — The general from such members for the payment of a special amount upon the death of each member to a beneficiary named by him is not a charitable association, and its property and funds are not used exclusively for charitable purposes so as to be exempt from taxation by the laws of this state.

Same—change of law.

2. Where the legislature has passed an act providing for a new system of raising revenue, and has thereby changed the former methods of procedure relating to matters of taxation, the courts, in construing its provisions, are not bound by any administrative construction of the former revenue law.

Same—deduction of outstanding indebtedness.

3. Under the rule established by the decisions of this court for the taxation of credits a fraternal beneficiary association is entitled to set off the amount of its outstanding beneficiary certificates, matured and unmatured, against securities in its fidelity or mortuary fund, set apart and devoted exclusively to the payment of such certificates.

(Sedgwick, Ch. J., dissents.)

(June 20, 1906.)

A PPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the District Court for Hamilton County refusing to exempt its property from taxation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hainer & Smith, for appellant:

An institution which extends charity to its own members only is a charitable instirule established by the decision is in accord with ROYAL HIGHLANDERS v. STATE, holding that fraternal benefit societies, not organized for profit or gain, but purely for the purpose of paying indemnity upon the death of their members, for an agreed compensation, are, in effect, life insurance companies, and not charitable or benevolent institutions, within the meaning of statutory provisions exempting the property of such institutions from taxation.

In National Council, K. & L. of S. v. Phillips, 63 Kan. 799, 66 Pac. 1011, it was held that a fraternal benefit society which paid death benefits was not a charitable or benevolent society within the meaning of a statute exempting from taxation property of benevolent associations, used exclusively for benevolent purposes, as such society was engaged in the life-insurance business. The court said: "What the association disburses is denominated 'payment.' Payment is made because the obligation has been created by an antecedent payment made to it. It is so much benefit paid because of so much and so many assessments paid. Its benevolence is purely of a commercial character. . . . Payments are made to it, not because of a charitable motive, but for the purpose of providing for those who are dependent upon the member."

In National Council, K. & L. of S. v. Phillips, 63 Kan. 808, 66 Pac. 1014, which approved the preceding case, it was again held that the same society was not within a statute exempting "all money and credits belonging exclusively to . . . beneficial and charitable institutions or associations, appropriated solely to sustain such institutions or associations." Again, in State Council, C. K. v. Effingham County, 198 Ill. 441, 64 N. E. 1104, it was held that a similar society, paying death benefits and indemnity for injuries and old age, was not within the purview of a statute exempting from taxation "all property of institutions of purely public charity, when actually used for such charitable purpose," such society not being engaged in a work of purely public charity. A statute was subsequently adopted exempting "all the money collected and on hand within this state, of every kind and nature, of fraternal beneficiary societies, . . . and used exclusively for the purposes of such societies, and not for pecuniary profit." But in Supreme Lodge M. A. F. O. v. Effingham County, 223 Ill. 64, 79 N. E. 23, it was held that this statute was unconstitutional for the reason that, under the decision in the previous case, such a society could not be brought within the class of "institutions of purely public charity," the property of which is permitted by the Constitution to be exempted from taxation, and did not belong to any other of the classes to which the constitutional privilege of exemption extends.

In Jones's Estate, 22 Abb. N. C. 50, 2, N. Y. Supp. 671, it was held that an association of bank clerks, extending aid to sick and disabled members as well as paying certain death benefits, did not fall within the purview of a statute exempting from taxation the property of "charitable institutions;" such society being nothing more than a benefit insurance society.

In Young Men's Protestant Temperance Benev. Soc. v. Fall River, 160 Mass. 409, 36 N. E. 57, it was held that a society organized for mutual relief, assistance, charity, and benevolence, paying certain sick and death benefits, was not a charitable association within a statute exempting the property of benevolent and charitable societies from taxation, but that it was a mutual relief association. The court said: "A society whose principal income is derived from a fixed, regular, compulsory contribution from its members, which is to constitute a fund to be used exclusively for the benefit of its members, cannot be held to be either a benevolent or a charitable society within the meaning of the statute" creating such exemption.

An association organized under the general incorporation laws, the principal objects and functions of which are to secure to each member thereof the payment, on his death, to his beneficiary or representative, of a certain sum of money, subject to the ful-tution within the meaning of the law exempting such institutions from taxation.

State ex rel. Breckenridge v. Fleming, 70 Neb. 523, 97 N. W. 1063; Lancaster County v. McDonald (Neb.) 103 N. W. 78.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is before us on appeal from a filment of the conditions imposed by the charter and by-laws, two of the qualifications of membership being: a sound physical condition and age under fifty, is essentially a life insurance company, and is not entitled to the benefit of an exemption extended by a statute to secret benevolent or fraternal societies which pay sick or death benefits to widows and orphans, or heirs or relatives of deceased members, notwithstanding that membership is limited to Masons. Masonic Aid Asso. v. Taylor, 2 S. D. 324, 50 N. W. 93. The court said, in support of its decision: "A society which, by contract, agrees to pay to the beneficiary of a deceased member a sum of money, is an insurance company whatever may be the terms of payment, or the consideration by the member, or the mode of payment of the sum to be paid in the event of his death."

But in Hibernian Benev. Soc. v. Kelly, 28 Or. 173, 30 L.R.A. 167, 52 Am. St. Rep. 760, 42 Pac. 3, it was held that a charitable and benevolent society, paying sick, funeral, and death benefits in fixed amounts, with an additional amount in discretion of the local lodge, was a beneficial or charitable institution within the meaning of a statute exempting the property of such institutions; although the exemption in this case was denied upon the ground that the property was not actually occupied by the society. It was also further held that such statute was within a constitutional provision authorizing exemption of property devoted to "such charitable purposes as may be specified by law." "The court distinguishes this 7 L.R.A. (N.S.), case from those resting upon constitutional or statutory provisions exempting property devoted to "purely public charity;" and says: "But, under constitutional or legislative provisions which, like ours, provide for the exemption of certain property belonging to 'charitable institutions' and used for charitable purposes, it is believed that such an institution is entitled to the benefit of the exemption, although its benefactions are confined to its own members or their families." Petersburg v. Petersburg Benev. Mechanics' Asso. 78 Va. 431, cited in the opinion in the last case, holds that the property of a mutual society of which charity is the principal, but not sole, object, is exempt from taxation under a statute exempting the property of Masonic, Odd-Fellow, and other like benevolent associations, which devote the proceeds of their property exclusively to charitable purposes; and that such a statute does not violate a constitutional provision permitting the exemption of property used exclusively for benevolent and charitable purposes. It was said: "Its revenues . . . are wholly applied to the payment of its current expenses, the assistance of its indigent members, and the families of such of them as may have died in needy circumstances. These are charitable purposes, and the relief afforded is none the less charity because confined to members of the association and the families of deceased members. It is not essential to charity that it shall be universal."

judgment of the district court of Hamilton county, affirming the order of the board of equalization of that county in the matter of the assessment of the property of appellant (Royal Highlanders, a domestic fraternal beneficiary association) for taxation, for the year 1905. It appears that the association is duly organized under the laws of this state, and has its home office and principal place of business at Aurora, in Hamilton county; that in May, 1905, in response to the demand of the county assessor of said county, the association delivered to him a schedule of its property, from which it appears that it was the owner of certain lots in the city of Aurora, Hamilton county, Nebraska, and the building situated thereon, of the cost and value of $21,238.56; that it had on hand furniture, fixtures, and office supplies of the value of $1,200; that it had money in the banks of Aurora amounting to $13,666.31; that it owned securities deposited as a credit, with the auditor of public accounts of the state of Nebraska, amounting to $455,900, which credit was its mortuary fund deposited under the provisions of the statutes governing the affairs of such associations, the same having been collected and set apart for the payment of its debt due and to become due on the beneficiary certificates issued to and held by its members. All of said property was claimed by the association to be exempt from taxation, for the reason that it was used exclusively for charitable purposes. It was further claimed that the mortuary fund so deposited with the auditor of public accounts was not subject to taxation because the association had the right to set off the amount of its obligations or debts due, and to become due, on said beneficiary certificates against said credit, which would leave it no net credit for taxation. Thereupon the assessor duly entered all of said property on the tax lists of said county for assessment. Thereafter the association appeared before the county board of equalization and filed its petition and protest claiming said property, and all thereof, as exempt, for the reasons stated in its schedule. The board made an order sustaining the assessment as made by the assessor, and the association appealed to the district court of Hamilton county. To maintain its position in that court, the association filed its petition, setting forth more particularly and at large the matters contained in its protest, and prayed for a judgment declaring its property wholly exempt from taxation, and reversing the order of the county board. To this petition the attorney general and the county attorney of Hamilton county filed a general demurrer, which was 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) sustained. The association excepted, elected to stand upon its said petition, offered evidence in support of all of the allegations thereof, which evidence was excluded, and thereupon the court rendered judgment against the association, affirming the order of the board of equalization, and dismissing the appeal of the association at its costs.

It may be stated, in passing, that it clearly appears from the petition that the appellant is a fraternal beneficiary association, organized under the provisions of chapter 43 of the Compiled Statutes of 1903 of this state, having a lodge system with ritualistic form of work, and a representative form of government; that it is formed, organized, and carried on for the sole benefit of its members and their beneficiaries, and not for profit; that for and in consideration of certain stipulated payments in the form of fees and dues it issues beneficiary certificates on the lives of its members, payable after their death to beneficiaries named therein in manner and form as provided by its by-laws and the statutes of this state governing such associations; that it has its fidelity or mortuary fund, amounting to $455,900, deposited with the auditor of public accounts, which fund is set apart and pledged by said association, and by law, for the payment of its beneficiary certificates due and to become due, and constitutes a trust fund for that purpose, and for no other. That of its credit balance at the banks, $12,174.98 belongs to said fund, and the remainder thereof, amounting to $491.34, represents a fund used for the purpose of paying the running expenses of the association. The foregoing is an abridged statement of the facts shown by the record, but is quite sufficient as a basis for this opinion.

1. Appellant's first contention is that its entire property is exempt from taxation, because it is used exclusively for charitable purposes. This question must be determined, not by what the association professes to be, but by what it really is, and the nature of the business it conducts. The general trend of judicial opinion in this country is that organizations like the appellant are, in effect, mutual insurance companies. In State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Northwestern Mut. Live Stock Asso. 16 Neb. 549, 20 N. W. 852, it was held that an association which insured only the property of its members by a policy in the form of a certificate of membership, for a premium paid simply as an admission fee, and by assessing its members to pay for the losses sustained by such certificate holders, was, to all intents and purposes, a mutual insurance company. Again, in State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Farm- ers & M. Mut. Benev. Asso. 18 Neb. 276, 25 N. W. 81, the court, speaking of associations like the appellant, said: "Courts have, with a great degree of unanimity, treated all such organizations as substantially life insurance companies, applying to them and to the mutual relations of the members the rules and principles applicable to the contract of life insurance." The appellant classes itself as exclusively a charitable organization, but, from an examination of its by-laws, called "original edicts," it appears that it is conducted for the sole benefit of its members and their beneficiaries. Its declared purposes are: "First, to unite for mutual benefit and fraternal protection all white persons of sound physical health and exemplary character, between the ages of eighteen and sixty-five; and to bestow substantial benefits upon the beneficiaries of its membership, admitted between the ages of eighteen and forty-eight years, who are entitled thereto. Second, to cheer and aid the unfortunate, to comfort and provide for the sick and aged, and to bury with becoming honor the dead of our membership. Third, to educate its members socially, morally, and intellectually, promulgating by ritualistic degrees the principles of prudence, fidelity, and valor. Fourth, to establish and maintain funds for the purpose of paying all benefits provided for the members and their beneficiaries, and to defray the expense of management and promotion." All of these purposes are confined to its members, and are dependent upon the payment by them of the assessments required by the by-laws. Beneficiary members get what is paid for, and nothing more. If they cease to pay, they cease to receive. Members continue to pay for the benefit of another, not because of any charitable or benevolent impulse, but because they expect, upon their death, that those whom they are interested in, or bound by law or ties of affection to provide for, will receive the amount which it is agreed in the beneficiary certificate will be paid by the association to such beneficiary. This is neither charity nor benevolence. Payment to the beneficiary does not depend upon his or her financial condition. A wealthy child or widow of the assured member would be entitled to claim the amount named in his certificate, equally with one poor or needy. This benefit is paid because of so much money, and so many assessments, paid by the assured member. This benevolence or charity is purely of a commercial character. It does not seek out the needy, but invites only the able-bodied and healthy. It is a business arrangement. The beneficiary receives payment because of a contract obligation on the part of the association to make such payment. In State ex rel. Graham v. Miller, 66 Iowa, 34, 23 N. W. 241, the court held that the Ancient Order of United Workmen, an association of practically the same character as the appellant, is a life insurance company; that its fraternal character was simply an incident to its many purposes. In Robinson v. Templar Lodge, No. 17, 1. O. O. F. 117 Cal. 370, 59 Am. St. Rep. 193, 49 Pac. 170, the court said of an association similar in character and regulations to the appellant, concerning payments to be made to it, that "these benefits are not charities in the strictest sense. They are dues which the society becomes obliged to pay in certain events. It is a matter of right, and not of grace. A consideration is paid, and the lodge reserves no right to withhold payments when the conditions arise." It seems clear, therefore, that the appellant is not what may be termed purely or exclusively a charitable organization. It further appears from an examination of its by-laws that its funds are divided into two classes, as follows: "The finance of the fraternity shall be divided into two funds: The fidelity fund and the general fund." The fidelity fund of the association is its mortuary fund, and is set apart for the payment of its beneficiary certificates due and to become due, while the general fund is used for organizing, maintaining, and promoting the best interest, growth, and welfare of the fraternity. In other words, for the payment of the expenses of carrying on its business. So we are of opinion that the property of the appellant is not exempt from taxation by reason of its being used exclusively for charitable purposes.

2. It is further contended that we are bound by the administrative construction of our former revenue law. It is said, in substance, that our Constitution was adopted in 1875; that the legislature of 1879, acting under the provisions of said instrument, relating to taxation, framed a general revenue law, and exempted from taxation all property used exclusively for charitable purposes; that said revenue law has been so construed that no one has ever thought of taxing the funds of a fraternal beneficiary society until the year 1904; that the present revenue act is, in substance, the same as the former one; that the courts are bound by such administrative construction, and should not now hold the property of such associations subject to taxation. The doctrine of estoppel by construction is well established, and the argument of counsel based thereon comes with much force. Indeed, it might be held conclusive, were it not for the fact that, in the year 1903, the leg-
